P. S. When the bill emerged from nference the only measure of retaliaon remaining was the power to prevent e clearance from American ports of ips discriminating against American ippers.

New York Again Walking. The ttlement of August 7 between the rface car companies and the carmen's ion in New York City did not result permanent peace. Attempts of the ion to organize subway and elevated orkers and attempts of the company secure individual contracts with ese workers resulted in a new strike claration on September 6, affecting st only the elevated and subway and e green cars operated by the New ork City Railways Company. The rike on the elevated and subway was complete failure as far as interrupting rvice was concerned, although about o thousand of the 11,000 employees it work. The green cars operated a enty per cent. service, and the comnies within forty-eight hours after e declaring of the strike prophesied short life for it. The unions, however, lled a strike on September 9 on all lines the Bronx and Westchester County, ese being known as the red cars, and eceeded in practically tying up traffic these lines. The impetus of this ditional support also brought out me additional men from the lines on ich the strike had first been declared. the face of a declaration by the anagements of the various railroads volved, that they expected to make is strike the end of unionism on their es, the carmen called to their assisnce all the organizations of labor withthe greater city, and there was a ssibility, as this issue of the Christian rald went to press, of sympathetic ikes which would involve 800,000 n and tie up practically all of the lustry of the city.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Balkans continued to be the center of interest during the past week, August 29 to September 6, not only because of the actual fighting, but because of the various lightning-like changes in the Grecian situation. Exactly what has happened in Greece is somewhat obscure, but at least we can draw some few certain facts from the mass of conflicting reports.

The Allies have sent a large squadron, accompanied by transports carrying troops, to Piræus, the port of Athens, and have seized the Austrian and German merchant ships lying in that port and sunk a German submarine there. They have also demanded of the Greek government the possession and control of the Greek posts and telegraphs, on the ground that these were being used by the Teutonic agents in Greece for the purpose of transmitting information concerning the movements of the Allies to the Teutonic armies on the northern Greek border. It also seems probable that the Allies have sent troops into Athens itself, since reports apparently well founded reach us that the Teutonic diplomatic and other agents in Athens have been arrested and confined on their warships. Furthermore, it is also reported that the Allies have demanded of the Greek government the use of the railroads leading north from Athens to the western portion of the northern Greek border, and have announced that they intend to use Athens, in connection with these railroads, as the base for the left wing of the Allied forces operating on this border. Whether or not the Greek government has acceded to this request is not at present definitely known, but no doubt it ultimately will, as even if it wished to refuse, its situation is not such that it can do so with safety.

The position of King Constantine is not at all clear from the heavily censored dispatches which are reaching us. In fact, there have been repeated rumors that the king has abdicated and that his son George has taken his place on the throne, but these rumors must be taken with reserve. The Greek elections set for early October are reported to have been postponed again, and in the meantime the new prime minister appears to have assumed almost dictatorial powers. The political activity of the late prime minister Venizelos is increasing, but the fact must always be kept in mind that Venizelos is a Cretan, and that the continental Greeks have never in the past given their full confidence to a Cretan.

At Salonica there has been a revolution started by a number of Greeks who are desirous of joining the Entente powers. These revolutionists, under the title of the "Macedonian Defense Committee," attacked the Greek regulars in the Salonica barracks and at other points in the immediate neighborhood of that city. Fighting ensued, as the regulars refused to surrender the places confided to their guard, and finally, to prevent further bloodshed, the French under General Sarrail interfered, with the result that the revolutionists gained possession of the coveted points. Some 3,000 of these revolutionists started toward Kavala to resist the Bulgarians operating in that direction, but this force is said to have had the bad luck of being captured before being able to strike a blow.

Bulgaria and Turkey have declared war on Rumania, thus setting to rest various rumors of the demand for a separate peace on the part of Turkey and a change of sides on the part of Bulgaria.

In the Austro-Rumanian conflict, the Rumanians have succeeded in forcing their way across the range of the Transylvanian Alps at the frontier, on a wide front of more than a hundred miles, and in capturing a number of Austrian villages and towns on the northern slope of these mountains. Most notable among the towns taken are Petroseny on the Rumanian left wing and Kronstadt on the right. In their center their advance has not, however, made as notable progress, and Hermannstadt still resists their onslaughts. It may be assumed, however, that this town will eventually be taken, as it appears probable that the Austrians will gradually fall back to the east and west line formed by the Great Kokel and Maros Rivers, and make their stand on this natural line of defense south of Carlsburg, where they will also have the advantage of a strategically developed railroad system on their front and rear.

The Rumanians claim to have taken several thousand Austrian prisoners, besides considerable other booty.

While these things have been taking place on the Austro-Rumanian frontier in the north, fighting has also been begun on the Bulgaro-Rumanian frontier in the south, with opposite results. On this southern frontier the Bulgarian and German troops have succeeded, with the active aid of the Austrian-Danube fleet of monitors, in crossing that river in force and penetrating deep into Dobrudja, which, as my readers may remember, is the strip of territory surrendered by Bulgaria to Rumania as the result of the second Balkan War; and in driving the Rumanians before

The American Home

A SERMON BY PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON

Text: "So he left them and went out of the city to Bethany." Matt. 21 : 17

Charles Monroe Sheldon, D.D., pastor Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kan., has spoken to the American public from pulpit and printed page for over thirty years. His sermons and books are among the most prized contributions to modern religious and sociological literature.

ONE of the greatest men in the world once said that the three greatest words in the English language were "Mother, Home and Heaven," and in spite of all the changes which have taken place in the habits of the American people, as their cities have grown greater and the hotel, apartment house and tenement have in many cases driven the home out of existence, it is still true that there is no equivalent for the home, and no other organization which can compare with it for necessity or happiness.

My earliest boyhood recollections center about a log house on the prairie. My father, who had been preaching for forty years almost without a vacation, suddenly broke down in health and the doctor said he would die if he did not live out of doors. So he sold everything he could not move and went with the entire family in the early seventies out to the prairies of Southern Dakota. There was not a mile of railroad in the whole territory, which was then undivided. We went out on the prairie and, under the homestead law, took out a quarter section of land, for which we paid $27. There was nothing there but sunshine and grass. We lived on that quarter section five years and "proved up" on it. The one hundred and sixty acres of beautiful prairie land then belonged to us in fee simple, and on that farm I lived as a boy during the entire period until I went away to the university.

WE built a log house on the highest knoll of the land, going down on the Missouri River, where we had a little wood lot, cutting down the cottonwood trees, peeling off the bark, and hauling the logs out to the farm. When the house was finished it had just two rooms in it, upstairs and downstairs. We had not much of anything left but imaginations, and we put them to work. We drew a line down across the floor, about one-third of the distance from one end of the house, reared an imaginary partition, papered it mentally on both sides, and called that end of the house our kitchen. There my mother did the work for a large family of boys and girls. In the middle of the house we had two rooms, a sitting-room and a dining-room; in these we ate our meals and spent our evenings for the most part. In the other third of the house, which was separated from the sitting-room by an imaginary wall, we had a bit of carpet on the floor, some pictures on the wall, a rocking-chair, an old sofa and a case of books; and when we felt particularly aristocratic we used to go over and sit down in what we called the parlor. Upstairs were little bedrooms made by hanging strips of cloth from the rafters. In this log house I spent my boyhood, and when night came and the chores were done out at the barn, cows milked and cattle fed, we would come into the house and help mother do up the evening work after supper, take the leaves out of the dining-room table, make a little round table out of it and, lighting a kerosene lamp, put it down in the middle; and then each boy and girl would hunt up his book, back up to the table, and read through the long winter evenings. It was a literal family circle, with every boy and girl present. Our nearest neighbor was six miles away. There were no "movies" to go to, and nothing to do but stay at home.

EVERY morning of my life in this log house, we had family prayers. Right after breakfast the whole family would move over into the parlor and sit down. Father would read a portion out of the chapter for the day; mother would follow, then the oldest boy and the oldest girl. We read the entire Bible without skipping a single syllable. In this way I heard the whole Bible read out loud seven times before I went away to school. Following the Bible reading we sang a hymn, and after that father offered a prayer for God's blessing on the day's work, and we would all in turn go up to father's knee and say the Lord's Prayer out loud, and then we would all sit down and keep still for a little. Then father would rise and we would follow him out, pick up our tools of labor, and go to work.

The vision of that log house out on the prairie of South Dakota is the strongest memory I have. It represented things which I did not fully understand as a boy, but which I have come to understand better since, and which, I honestly believe, summed up in a very true fashion the elements that go to make a true American home. Those elements stand out clearly in the following outline, perhaps somewhat idealized, but none the less fundamental to the welfare and future stability of the American nation.

What constitutes a real American home—the basis of American citizenship and the source of its future happiness and power? The following, at least, must be considered as essential factors in the building and maintaining of such a vital structure:

THE true American home must start with clean physical, mental, moral and spiritual life on the part of both the man and the woman who begin the home. There cannot be a happy or safe home unless both father and mother have healthy bodies, free from disease. For several years I have made it a rule in my own parish to require of my own young people a certificate of physical health from some good Christian physician, man or woman, before performing a marriage ceremony. My young people have gladly complied with this request. They are glad to know that they are well, and I have had no trouble with any one in my own parish. The foundation of a true home cannot be laid unless there is also moral and mental healthfulness; clear and sound definitions of right and wrong, convictions in the matter of righteousness. That leads necessarily to the other great qualification, spiritual healthfulness. The old rule that a Christian should not wed with an unbeliever is fundamentally sound. Spiritual oneness of feeling may be called an absolute necessity of a happy wedded life. Lack of religious conviction or feeling on the part of either husband or wife will in the end lead to difficulty, and in many cases to the final destruction of the real home.

Starting with healthfulness of mind, body, and spirit, the happy home depends on the spirit of companionship between the man and woman. This does not necessarily mean equality of mental power; but it does mean a sympathy with common mental things, and the enjoyment together of great essentials, everything else being equal. If on both sides there is a love of music, art and literature and common human ambitions, there will be a lasting union. There must be points of contact on the mental side of married life to create the greatest happiness and the most lasting satisfaction.

ANOTHER great attribute necessary for the establishment of a good home is mutual confidence of the man and woman in each other. This is the underlying basis of real love between man and woman—absence of jealousy and suspicion, absence of all disrespect which grows out of narrow and unjust thoughts of one another.

The rock on which many a stanch matrimonial ship is wrecked is the rock of finances. Some of the happiest homes I know are those where the man divides his earnings with his wife, and shares with her equally as a wage-earner. I know of one family where the husband deposits his money each week in the bank to his wife's credit, and she draws out by check for the household needs. He is able to trust her absolutely in the wisdom of her expenditures. I know another family where the husband divides equally his salary with his wife, each one of them having a bank account, but it is all one common purse, and they talk about their financial matters as freely as about everything else. Many an American home is unhappy and the wife is living a life of humiliation because the husband does not talk over his financial matters with her, and many a home has been wrecked because of the ignorance on the part of the wife of her husband's financial ability. There should be the utmost frankness in this matter. A good wife is just as much a wage-earner in the home as a man. She is taking care of the house and the children, she is doing her share to maintain the home, just the same as the man who goes down to his business and "makes the money."

THE ideal home always has children in it, and as they come into the world in the true American home, they ought to feel from the beginning that they have a real father and mother. Father and mother should represent authority to them and the highest authority they know. The first thing a child ought to learn is obedience. Disobedience was the first sin of the world's first parents. It was what started the world down hill. A child gets its first start toward real happiness along the track of real obedience to real authority. If that is lacking, there is no home worthy of the name. If a child does not learn to obey when it is little, in all likelihood it will be lawless when it gets big.

The true American home, with all its authoritative note, has also a note of freedom. Parents not only exercise authority, but they respect their children, and parents who do not learn how to respect their children do not know how to govern them. This freedom carries with it the thought of the child's future. There are no two children just alike, not even in the same home. The inclinations of boy or girl, especially toward a future career, shou be fully respected by father and mother, and indiv ual capacity for doing special things in the wo ought to be carefully studied. If a boy is cut c for a farmer, it is foolishness to try to drive him ir the ministry. If he has a liking for chemistry would make a good electrician, it is cruelty to try break him into the law, or to make him take up l father's business.

JUST as the true home must have in it a true co panionship between husband and wife, so must t true home have in it the element of companionsl between parents and children. One reason why many boys and girls are playing in the streets in ci or town is because father and mother have ceased play with their own children after they have grown I know of one happy American home where the fath regularly takes his sons with him to play golf eve Saturday afternoon, and where the mother practi music with her daughters in the evening, giving th the benefit of her best musical culture. Playing wi children is a great art. Thousands of American fath and mothers have never learned it. They play wi the little babies, but cease that play when the bab become boys and girls, and at that critical point th lose touch with their own children.

THE true American home must have a foundati in real religious feeling and conviction. It is r enough to have culture or artistic sense; not enou that the boys and girls in a family should have ple ant rooms—each one a room for himself—filled wi books, pictures and works of art. There must be family altar around which all the members gath Within the last five years I have met thousands ministers of different denominations, and alm without exception they deplore the fact that the habit of family worship has gone out of nearly all homes in their parishes, and nothing has come in take its place.

They say there is going to be a revival of prayer the European homes after the war. I believe there nothing that culture or education or wealth can do a family which can equal the simple habit of a fam altar, either morning or evening, when an entire hou hold comes together, not for the discussion of stud or amusements or even good art and literature, but the spiritual vision of God and another world in a r religious exercise; where the father is the leader a the mother is the attendant. The future Americ home must have its real foundation in a Christi faith, and children brought up in that atmosphere w carry with them the great essentials all through li Such homes will not depend for happiness or pow on mere physical wealth, or any outward sign of pow They will grow up strong and healthy, a blessing to t public, because the soil is deep and the seed is good.

NO home worthy of the name can be maintain without the great factor called cooperati A true Christian spirit can secure this, and nothi else can. In the memory of my own boyhood the fa that my mother always made each child to feel l importance in the circle stands out, next to the re gious factor, as supreme. There was a regular ta assigned each child as soon as he could contrib anything to the mutual welfare of the whole. were all taught to do our share of the housework, a boys as well as girls were taught to be good coo I am quite sure that, with a little fresh rehearsing could cook and serve a fairly good seven-cou dinner from the lessons my mother gave me. And those early days every boy and girl knew how to me and even make their own clothes. The cooperati spirit kept the circle from breaking under stress hard times, sickness, accident and danger.

I know homes that are broken, families that a

The Transmission of Blessings

SUNDAY, September 24. II Cor. 1:3, 4. "The God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our troubles, that we may be able to comfort." Here is one of the great secrets of great living. If we would help others efficiently, we must recall how God has dealt with us. Forgetfulness in the one direction will breed selfishness in the other. Where there is no keen sense of divine mercy there is not likely to be a broad stream of vital beneficence. And even if we were inclined to be beneficent, our service would probably be wanting in fine sense and discernment. It is the remembrance of God's mercy which inclines us to be merciful, and it is the same remembrance which endows our mercy with wise and intelligent sight. What the Lord has done for us will teach us what we ought to do to others; and how the Lord did it unto us will instruct us as to our appropriate moods and manners. "I forgave thee all that debt: oughtest thou not, therefore, to have had compassion on thy fellow servant as I had compassion on thee?" Our obligations are born in our blessings: if we seriously consider the one we shall undertake the other.

And here the apostle asks us to remember our Lord's comforts. We are to retrace our steps down the old road and call to mind just how the Lord visited us in the consolations of his grace. We are to recall how he came to us in the dark hours of our sorrow and pain. We are to recollect how he approached us, and in what particular manner he gave us his cordials and balms. In which of his promises did we find the richest bread of endurance? What word was it that relit our flickering lamp? Which of his inspired hymns gave us new wings of faith and hope? What holy vision took us far beyond the darkness of our prison-house to fairer worlds on high? What was it brought back a little salt and savor to our tasteless days? So are we to reread our yesterdays, with memory and imagination all awake, repeopling the road with the messenger comforts of our Lord.

And all this we are to do in order that we may learn how to comfort others. We were comforted in order that we might be comforters. We are to take the light he gave us and kindle another man's lamp. We are to take his tenderness and touch the sorrows of others as he touched ours. Within a few hours after Mrs. Gladstone had lost her husband she was in the home of a poor miner, comforting a widow whose husband had just been killed in the mine. Comforted to comfort! And what need there is of comforters today! Let us go back on our old roads, and diligently study God's dealings with us, that in the power of his grace we may be skilful in the comfort of others.

The Heart's Longing in Prayer

MONDAY, September 25. Ps. 90:1-17. "Let thy work appear: thy glory upon children: the beauty of the Lord upon us." This psalm was already venerable with age when David lived and Homer sang. Moses appears to have composed it during the wilderness wanderings, for all its imagery is borrowed from the scenery through which Israel marched and countermarched. The scorched and withered grass, the mountain-flood, the tale told of the camp-fires, the night-watch through the brief Eastern darkness! It contains a threefold prayer: for the young—"O satisfy us early with thy mercy!" For the middle-aged—"Make us glad!" and for the old.

The deepest longing of our heart should ever be for the manifestation of God's work. We have seen plenty of man's work, and because our churches are so full of it there is so much apathy and failure. Man can never fully satisfy his fellowman. In God we live, and move, and have our being, and anything that comes between the human soul and the divine element in which it was meant to thrive inflicts irreparable wrong. We cannot even help our neighbors efficiently unless we are ourselves in direct touch with God and beholding his work. Moses had done his best for his people, and now turns to God, asking him to take up the tangled skeins and do that wherein he had failed. It is touching to hear the aged praying for the young life around them and asking that it may be beautiful, not only with the natural beauty of youth, but with God's own beauty—"the beauties of holiness." The last petition of all is that when the worker is no more able to continue his work, God himself will see that it shall not be lost in the drifting sands, but established as a permanent temple for coming generations.

What Bible Study Does for Men

TUESDAY, September 26. Rom. 15:4. "That through patience and comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope." Hall Caine said: "I think that I know my Bible as few literary men know it. There is no book in the world like it; the finest novels ever written fall far short in interest of any of the stories it tells. Whatever strong situations I have in my books are not of my creation, but are taken from the Bible."

Hallam said: "I see that the Bible fits into every fold and crevice of the human heart. I am a man, and I believe that this is God's book because it is man's book."

More important even than the literary inspiration of the Bible is that uplifting realization that the "Book of books" depicts the preeminent meetings of God with men; here one can see every phase of our humanity reflected in the careers of persons made in the same fashion as ourselves. The Bible gives us comfort, hope, courage and patience, for it pictures again and again the new opportunity God holds out to the children whom he loves. No sin is so black that it does not have its counterpart in some Biblical character's life, and God is shown as great enough to cure it.

Try to think of any kind of person who could not find some word seemingly intended for him in this Book of universal life biography. Think of what this Book, spread open on our mothers' laps, has meant to our early training. Are we fitting ourselves to pass it on through word of mouth to the men and women of the next generation? We may have limited talents, but we can all help to keep the Bible alive in men's hearts.

The Reality of God's Presence in Worship

WEDNESDAY, September 27. Joshua 5:10-15. "Joshua fell on his face and did worship." Behind lay the Jordan; beneath, under the shadow of the hill, the camp; before, the walls of Jericho, guarding the main pass into the Land of Promise. Can we doubt why Joshua was walking by himself somewhere in the neighborhood of the first walled city of his campaign? We all have our Jerichos. Problems that baffle. Characters which resist our every overture. A godless household. A careless, worldly congregation. Our persecutors and detractors. No one seems to understand; none can help. We are in sore straits and must get alone. It is at such times that we may expect, through the rent veil, to see the Lord of Hosts standing before us, whilst we fall down to worship.

Worship is our highest function in prayer. In thanksgiving we acknowledge our deep indebtedness for many and great mercies; in supplication we ask for pardon; in intercession, it is often for our beloved that we pray. But in worship we leave ourselves and our needs behind, and enter the temple where the seraphim veil their faces with their wings and cry, "Holy, holy, holy!" It is in such an attitude that we are most amenable for God's copartnership. We are not required to receive any command or proffer any request, but just to take the shoes from off our feet in reverent awe. There is nothing more to be said and done than quietly to absorb the thought that God is there, come to ally himself with you, as real as flesh and blood can be. Recognize that even Canaan is holy when God stands upon its soil.

Taking Time to Be Happy

THURSDAY, September 28. Ps. 109:28. "But thy servant shall rejoice." An old preacher in speaking of one of his very staid and somber parishioners said: "I think he is a Christian, but he doesn't spread his wings and rejoice before the Lord."

The present generation has taken a more attractive and on the whole a more praiseworthy view of its religion, one more in accord with the spirit of the teachings of Christianity's great Founder, than that held by some of our forefathers. To certain of these, there was no warrant for rejoicing, even in the days of one's youth. To be religious was to be clothed with pious seriousness, scarcely recognizing the beneficial elements of play and joyousness.

Yet many of us who have discarded long-faced religion as both unscriptural and lacking in winning qualities are taking our business and our life generally too seriously to merit the psalmist's picture, "But thy servant shall rejoice." Life, to the man who has forgotten how to smile or laugh, becomes a dreary, creaking thing, a matter of machinery and routine, rather than a glad, meaningful experience, filled with new daily adventures of the heart and spirit. The Christian should leave spaces in his busy life for the cultivation of a spirit of rejoicing. If our hearts are to be filled with song in heaven, can you think of any reason why the habit of singing should not be natural to us here? Is not the habit of rejoicing and being happy like other habits, dependent upon exercise?

A. C. Benson says: "We have a dreary belief that it is every one's duty to get on, to make money, to win consideration, to be respected. I am not so sure that these ambitions are not absolutely wrong; a man ought to have work and enjoy it, and after that he ought to desire to be innocently happy, and to be loved."

We may not have thought of the expanding of our natures by having wholesome hobbies, by half-holidays in the woods, or in taking long walks in the country or by the sea—and days away from work occasionally, when we shall try to be as care-free and happy as the birds. This may be our religious duty; and if we once catch the note of a rejoicing heart, we shall find it hard not to sing, even at our work.

The Sin That Lurks in the Heart

FRIDAY, September 29. Joshua 7:1-12. "And the Lord said, Get thee up." It was natural for Joshua to rend his clothes and fall on his face before the ark—he and the elders of Israel, with dust on their heads—until nightfall. This was as Moses had often done; and besides, they had no other resource. It was right to couple the thought of the dishonor done to God's holy name with the peril in which defeat had placed them. The name and glory of God had always been one of the chief arguments of the great Lawgiver, who had left so deep an impression on them all. These should always be our uppermost anxiety and lend us our main argument. But a work had to be done more urgent and imperative than even prayer could be. And so the Almighty bade Joshua arise and put right the great wrong that was paralyzing the strength of the chosen people.

When there is a flaw or fault in the insulation of the wire through which currents of divine power and grace come to us, it is useless to pray for help until we have repaired the defect. Much of the time spent in public and private prayer would be better employed by subjecting our relations with the people around us to a searching scrutiny. It is a mistake to lie on the ground pleading for the Pentecostal blessing, when there is an evil thing in our hearts that blocks out God's incoming. He cannot ally himself with consciously permitted sin. Achan must be discovered and stoned!

The Believer's Growth in Faith

SATURDAY, September 30. Rom. 10:10. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness." We partially know about God by thinking; we fully know him only by believing. Theories will change, but heart experiences of the divine presence in the soul are the same as when God walked with Adam in Eden. The feelings of sin and sorrow, of joy and peace, are common to all ages and all hearts. There can be no evolution in the nature of love and faith. The only change may be in the evermore increasing volume. The Lord's Prayer is hallowed for the heart. God's love shed abroad in the heart makes all Christians one in him.

An American who met a heathen convert in India saw the light of peace and joy on his face. They recognized each other as followers of Jesus, but they could not convey by words the likeness of their experience, except that there are two words which are the same in all languages; so one said "Amen" and the other "Hallelujah!" Thus a single word may express volumes of heart experience, because it awakens similar feelings in consciousness.

While the mind is often lost in the labyrinths of speculation, the heart, through the telescope of faith, sees the Father's home a palace of splendor at the end of the way, and feels the joy unspeakable and full of glory. The way of the doubter is hard and gloomy, but the way of faith is the path of hope and leads to everlasting triumph.

American Queens and Their Courts

THE SONG

HE was just a street musician, and he played a simple song
In the softness of the twilight as the shadows flickered long;
But a boy who hurried past him stopped to listen to him play,
And a girl whose feet had faltered found the grace to pause and pray.
He was just a street musician, but he pointed out the way.

Yes, the song was very simple, but the boy saw mountains green,
And a shining, thread-like river, and a tiny, homelike scene;
Saw a farmhouse, stained by weather, and he knew the door was wide,
And he knew that love was waiting just across the sill inside;
And he murmured softly, "Mother. . ." and his heart within him cried.

And the girl remembered dimly in the land of long ago,
How she'd knelt beside her window and had watched the sunset glow
Out across the golden cornfields—when her heart was free from sin,
When she had not known the city with its fever and its din—
And her tears were near the surface as she breathed, "I'll fight—and win!"

HE was just a street musician, and he played a simple song:
But it echoed through the twilight as the shadows flickered long,
And it hovered o'er the city, pure and light as silver foam,
And it touched two hearts that wandered, and it told them not to roam—
He was just a street musician, and his song was "Home, Sweet Home."

AMERICA is a democratic country. Our Presidents come from the same social class to which we belong; our statesmen, many of them, have fought their way up from the masses. We bow the knee to no one—royalty is an empty word to us. And yet——

A powerful Chinese diplomat, while visiting America for the first time, made a statement to the press:

"But your women!" he exclaimed, "they are wonderful! So pleasant, so intelligent, so gracious! No other country has such women. They are like queens!"

I am inclined to agree with the Chinese diplomat. I come in contact with women—numbers of them—every day. I read letters from middle-aged mothers, I lunch with successful business girls, I travel on the same trains with countless busy stenographers and clerks. The young bride across the street tells me her plans, and the little widow around the corner has whispered the tale of her sorrow in my ear.

I agree with the Chinese diplomat. Our women are wonderful! They are pleasant and gracious and intelligent. They are, many of them, queenly. And they help to make our country a wonderful country.

EVERY evening, almost, the passer-by may hear the sounds of mirth issuing from Mrs. Whitney's home. Clean, healthy mirth it is, with singing and gay conversation, and a more than occasional gust of laughter. Mrs. Whitney has a son and a daughter, and they are usually the ringleaders of the fun, but often I have seen Mrs. Whitney herself, gray head thrown back, laughing merrily in the midst of a group of young people.

The Whitney home is, I think, the happiest home on the street. The street, however, isn't a very large one. There are just the Smythes, and the Taylors, and Mr. and Mrs. Black in the immediate vicinity.

The Smythes live across the way from the Whitneys, and every night directly after supper one can see the Smythe boys going out sullenly into the street. Every one knows that they go regularly to a pool room, where they lose money and gain rather questionable information in exchange. After eight o'clock the Smythe home begins to look as dark and dismal as a tomb. It is, too. I've called there. It was during one of my calls that Mrs. Smythe spoke to me about her children.

"Fred and Jimmy," she told me, "are such a problem. I can't keep them home at night, no matter how I fuss with them."

Somehow I couldn't help answering her. "They are growing boys, Mrs. Smythe," I murmured; "do you ever do anything to keep them at home?"

Mrs. Smythe raised her eyebrows. "Certainly not!" she answered; "I can't do anything. And they should want to stay home. They can always read and go to bed early."

But I remembered the lights and laughter and music in the Whitney home, and I sighed.

THE Taylors have the most gorgeous house on our block. They have beautiful furniture and exquisite rugs, and costly bric-à-brac. But they don't encourage young guests.

"For," Mrs. Taylor told me once, "boys and girls will be careless. And young boys, especially, are all feet and elbows. I keep my son and daughter out of our best rooms, and I don't ask them to bring their friends in. It's taken us years to get our pretty things together, and I'm going to keep them pretty!"

The Taylor girl is sixteen and the boy eighteen. They come in, stealthily, at all hours of the night, through the side door, so that they won't disarrange anything valuable. They never spend an evening at home.

Mrs. Black is what you would call a careful housekeeper. She hates dust as I hate rattlesnakes. One never hears the buzzing of a fly in Mrs. Black's immaculate kitchen—one is always able to see a bright reflection in the depths of Mrs. Black's saucepans.

Mrs. Black has no children. Her husband is a careless, good-humored man, and likes to put his feet on a cushioned chair and read the newspaper aloud—likes to go to the movies of an evening, after supper. But Mr. Black is never allowed to put his feet on a cushioned chair, and he never takes Mrs. Black to the movies. For Mrs. Black says fretfully that she can't have dust on her chairs, and that, when the evening comes, she is too tired to go to the movies. "Keeping a house clean is not easy," she sighs. And so Mr. Black has begun to drop in at a club every night, where he may put his dusty feet anywhere. He reads steadily and smokes long black cigars—a series of them—from eight o'clock until eleven-thirty, when he yawns drowsily and goes home.

"I wonder," mourns Mrs. Black, "why he doesn't ever stay in at night—like other men!"

Yes, the Whitney home is, I think, the happiest home on the street. For the family all stay home at night. They want to stay home.

"WHY," says Mrs. Whitney laughingly (she is much given to laughter, is Mrs. Whitney!), "I like to have people around me—young and old people. And I encourage my husband and my children to have their friends drop in. For," and her voice became suddenly serious, "for I've found out that if people—especially young people—don't have a good time at home, they'll go somewhere else in search of it. That's why so many of our boys and girls go to the city—and temptation—every year. Because they're hunting for lights and laughter and—fun.

"I don't believe in neglecting my house or my housework. I don't believe in having dust around, or shabby furniture. But my family comes first—before work, or dust, or furniture—or anything!"

So spoke Mrs. Whitney. And somehow since that day I like to think of her as an American queen. And I like to think of her home—her happy, peaceful, laughter-filled little home—as her court.

I WAS riding out to the suburbs on the train a few nights ago when a boy who works in the crowded downtown section of New York drifted in and sat beside me. It had been a hot day in the city and he sighed tiredly as the train began to move.

"I hope," he said suddenly as we scurried through fields of tall dull-colored meadow grass, "I hope that mother will be waiting for me on the porch tonight in a fresh, white dress!"

MRS. GRANT has been married for twenty-five years. Her hair is almost white and she has become rather stout. She doesn't look at all like the slim golden-haired girl in the locket that hangs from Mr. Grant's watch-fob, but I'm sure that he doesn't realize the change. I spoke rather guardedly about it to Mrs. Grant one day.

"I think that your marriage must be just about ideal!" I murmured.

"Gracious, child!" answered Mrs. Grant with a faintly embarrassed laugh; "what a pretty compliment! But John and I are happy!

"You know," she went on after a moment's pause, "when I was first married and went to housekeeping I formed a habit that I have never broken. I've never, no matter how tired, or hot, or rushed I was, let John see me looking sloppy. We've been married twenty-five years. And I've never yet come down to breakfast in a calico wrapper. I've never greeted John in the evening in a mussy frock."

I wonder how many wives can say as much. And I wonder how many of them realize how curl-papers, and dressing-sacks, and ripped blouses take the romance out of married life. I wonder how many women know what it means to a man to see a neat, pretty figure opposite him at the breakfast table. I wonder if they realize how the tired husbands and sons look forward, as my city friend did, at the end of the weary day, to "mother in a fresh white dress!"

Don't you think that Mrs. Grant's habit—the habit that she has been faithful to for twenty-five years—puts her in the queen class?

LITTLE Mrs. Tyler has a rather intellectual husband. He is up to the minute in the topics of the day and he can talk equally well of literature, art and music. Some wives would sit around and be a gracefully silent background to such a husband; but little Mrs. Tyler always knows and understands just what Mr. Tyler is talking about.

"If my brain isn't as well stocked as my husband's," she says, "how can we be friends? And how can we love each other if we are not friends? We subscribe to a great many periodicals, and we buy numbers of books. And, even though I am rushed with other work, I find time to read enough of them to speak intelligently on certain topics. I always read the newspapers, too, so that I'm not way behind the times. Sometimes I put an evening aside—sometimes a whole day—to catch up in my reading. And my husband and I never find that we have nothing to talk about. And we're very happy!"

MRS. GARRETT is a farmer's wife. She lives in a white clapboard house that is five miles from the village and three miles from the nearest farm. The roads, in that part of the state, are not good, and so the Garretts stay at home with weekly trips to church and occasional shopping expeditions for relaxation. But the Garretts are not bored with their farm life.

"All day long," Mrs. Garrett told me, "we are very busy. My husband has the farm to care for, and I have three little children to dress and teacl nd love. Besides that, there is the l se-work, and the meals to get. (, I haven't time to be bored durin the day!"

"But the evenings," I sugg ed; "don't they ever seem long to ou? Don't you hate to stay arounc the house—always?"

Mrs. Garrett motioned me to a air and smiled as I sank into its cush ned softness.

"It's quite a story," she began, " r—yes—once I was bored You see, she went on after a pause, "when I rst went to housekeeping I had a p or. It was a parlor filled with stiff hors air furniture of my mother's, and st fed owls in glass cases, and oil painti in gilt frames. I kept the parlor sc pulously clean and stiff. And I kep the door locked unless I had a c ler. After dinner my husband and I v uld sit down in the dining-room and lk. There would be a red cover ove the table, but even so I could always em to see the dishes that had been t re. And somehow the room wasn't ex tly a change after the work of the day

"Then the babies came. After at, when they had been put to bed an evening I'd sit by the table and end their little clothes. And my hus nd would read the paper. And our lor would stay locked up—and stiff.

"And then one day a lady fror the city came to call. And I led her int my parlor. She looked around for a moi nt, and then,

"'What possibilities this room s!' she told me.

"'Possibilities?' I questioned.

"'Yes,' answered the lady fror the city. 'It's so big and cheery, and v uld look so sweet with flowers and l ght cushions. And you could have a wo erful blaze in that fireplace. It v uld make a lovely room to live in.'

"That call marked the passing c my parlor. It's a living-room now. G lually I got rid of the owls and the st est of the furniture. I opened the ors and let in sunlight and air. I co red the horsehair with chintz and pu gay cretonne cushions and hangings out the room. I soon had a fern sta ing in the corner, and logs in the firep ce.

"My husband began to get inter ted then. He finally wrote a myste us letter, and at last, one day, an ex ess parcel came to us. It contained a sic box and some wonderful records. nd then, before long, we subscribe to several magazines. And they were out on the living-room table. And r v," Mrs. Garrett laughed, "now, ir he evening time, we go into the living- om and read, and play our music box. nd it's different. It's like going nto another entirely new atmospher

IF all American housewives knew ow easily a home could be made ore attractive, there would be a great eal more happiness in our land. If ey knew how much difference a b ght table cover or a fresh vase of fl ers made they would not mind the tr ble that was taken in making the cov or cutting the flowers. If they realized ow much a well-set and dainty table lds to a dinner they would always ve well-set tables. If they knew how n ch a tiny child likes cookies and how n ch a cup of hot chocolate would mean a grown son when he has his boy fr nds in to visit, there would always be co ies and chocolate, with no thought o he extra labor involved. Successful h sekeeping, to my mind, resolves itself nto a program something like this:

A house clean and attractive.
One's self neat and attractive.
One's mind as well stocked as he closet shelves.
The happiness of the family b ore anything else.

I WAS talking not long ago a woman who teaches domestic sci ce.

"American homes will be much b er homes," she told me, "as soo as American women learn how n ch difference a yard of artistic ma ial and a potted plant can make."

"You're right," I answered. " nd American homes will be the ost wonderful homes in the world as on as women realize that love and be ty and understanding must be the fou lation of every home."

Spreading the Gospel in Chile

By
A. R. STARK

ALTHOUGH the economic conditions of Chile have been more affected by the European War than those of any other country not involved in hostilities, the volume of her comerce stands third today in South America. It is ne of the most progressive countries on the southern cotinent, with one of the most stable governments in South America. Its Transandean Railway links th Pacific coast with Buenos Aires on the Atlantic. I has two great railways transmounting the Andes to he hermit republic of Bolivia, one from Antofasta to Uyuni, Oruro, Potosi and La Paz, and the oer from the port of Arica to La Paz.

hile is the world's nitrate market. Nitrate is med on the desolate and dreary pampas of Tarapaca, Acama and Antofagasta. The borax deposits on the lcy Andes are so extensive that Chile could easily suply the whole world with borax. As a copper-plucing country it is destined probably to occupy th first place in the world's supply. Already enormous slting plants, like that of Chuquicamata, are in oration. Stock farming and agriculture in general resent important branches of Chilean industry in th southern section of the country. Still farther sch there are great timber forests, and on the most schern extremities of the continent the bleak wastes o ierra del Fuego have been turned into some of the fist wealth-producing sheep farms of South America.

olitically, Chile stands before the diplomatic world a he third partner in the A B C (Argentina, Brazil a Chile). On the Pacific coast of South America Cle's influence is dominant. The government at Stiago has strengthened and extended its influence a political position until today it has an important bring on the political conditions existing between Pama and the Straits of Magellan.

he pulse of Chile throbs with national life and hthy ambition. The Chileans are a sturdy and pgressive people, proud of their standing among th nations of South America. Since the War of lependence, Chileans have never forgotten the iience of the foreigner in connection with the delopment of the country. Names like O'Higgins, Chrane, MacKenna and Simpson are as popular tay as they were nearly a hundred years ago.

n religious life Chile would compare favorably wn most Roman Catholic countries in South Americ where no adequate outside reformed religious inence has been brought to bear upon it. Nominally a Chileans are Catholics, but there is a strong mement in the country toward irreligion from win. The following incident will serve to illustrate iortant developments that may be expected in the n future: During 1913 the country was stirred to itdepths by the arrival of the Papal delegate from Rne, commissioned, it is said, to negotiate a number ovaluable ecclesiastical properties and remit the peeds to Rome. This caused an outburst of popular ingnation. More than 50,000 people paraded the stets of Santiago, the capital, calling upon the government to expel the delegate and prohibit the sale of national property. This shows that the alienation between the church and the people is considerable, and that a hatred of Papal domination is already smoldering in the hearts of liberal students and the working classes of Chile.

In Chile, however, it may be said that there is religious liberty for all creeds, but the Roman Church is protected by the state and forms an important factor in many walks of national life. Both politically and socially, the church has a widely extended influence, and is extremely wealthy, apart from any maintenance received from the state. It is interesting to note that civil marriage is the only form acknowledged by the law. There is no divorce law in the country.

Although Chile is a republic, and all men are theoretically equal in the eyes of the law, yet in reality this is not so. Government of the people, by the people and for the people does not exist. There is a privileged class, composed mostly of the descendants of the old wealthy Spanish families, who exercise great power in all branches of the state, and in many things have the controlling voice. Between them and the middle class there is a fixed gulf; but even a wider gulf divides these two classes from the mass of working people, who are looked down upon with contempt.

Extreme poverty hardly exists in Chile as it is found in the large cities of Europe, and it would not exist at all if reasonable economy and foresight were practiced by the working classes. Intemperance, while not the sole cause of poverty, contributes very largely toward it. The government and the Congress have signally failed in the regulation of the liquor traffic and in grappling with conditions and forces that make for poverty, and which the working classes in their dense ignorance are hopelessly unable to overcome. Let it be granted that the working classes of Chile can earn a fair wage, either as skilled or unskilled workmen; it is almost impossible for the worker to find a decent dwelling to make a home in which the very minimum of cleanliness and comfort can be found.

If due attention were given to the most ordinary sanitary principles and hygiene, the death rate in the country would be extremely low in comparison with that of most countries in South America. In physique, the Chileans are the most sturdy race on the continent. Living by the seashore or mostly in the open air in the rural districts, a fine hardy manhood has been developed. The highest death rate is in the towns and cities, where dwelling houses lack the most elementary appliances of sanitation. Smallpox and typhoid are very prevalent, and some years fearful epidemics break out. Pneumonia and tuberculosis are also prevalent. But Chile's high death rate is mainly accounted for by the heavy infantile mortality from contagious diseases. The birth record of Chile is one of the highest in the world, but the mean rate of increase in population by excess of births over deaths reduces it to one of the lowest in the world. Thus one of the most healthful countries in the world reduces its increase to a minimum through ignorance, carelessness in the treatment of children, and the bad sanitary conditions in the dwellings of the working classes. A great and beneficent work can be done through evangelical missions in Chile by the appointment of a well-trained staff of deaconesses, with a fair elementary knowledge of sanitation. A work like this would open a door for the Gospel.

During the fifty odd years of missionary occupation, a great amount of preparatory work has been done in Bible circulation, evangelistic, pastoral and educational work. So far in the history of missionary enterprise, with rare exceptions, the Gospel has only reached the masses. The work has been characterized by both concentration and diffusion. There has been concentration in the capital and large cities like Valparaiso and Concepcion, and diffusion in the provinces. Scattered along the length of Chile are 53 churches and 125 preaching centers, with 5,700 communicants and a Chilean Protestant community of some 25,000. In the Sunday schools are some 6,000 children. A native ministry is being raised which already numbers 51 ordained men and 78 unordained. The general supervision of the work is under some 34 foreign missionaries. Added to the missionary enterprise is the work of the two great Bible societies, circulating thousands of copies of the Scriptures yearly. There have been many examples of remarkable conversion; lives have been renewed by divine grace, and homes transformed and elevated.

The Regional Congress recently held in Santiago brought foreign and native workers together from the leading centers in Chile. The delegates unanimously accepted the findings of the various commissions, covering the whole range of the field of missionary enterprise. In connection with the church in the field several important recommendations were made. In view of the imperative demand for more evangelistic work, it was felt that the number of national pastors should be greatly increased. It urged that a definite plan be adopted by all evangelical forces for increasing self-support. The importance of Sunday schools as an evangelistic agency for developing Christian character and as a training-ground for service was emphasized. The importance and place of Bible work was recognized and a wide circulation of the Scriptures was recommended. In view of the needs of women in the country for instruction in Christian living, in home hygiene, and the care of the sick, a training school for deaconnesses and nurses was recommended.

Although the various missionary societies at work in South America are spending large sums for the support and extension of the work, a stupendous task lies before them, which calls for a larger cooperation with the church at the home base, and a deeper consecration of the workers on the field before the Gospel has been adequately presented to the Latins.

America's Oldest Lighthouse

THE mariner sails the bounding deep and defies its terrors. He des his bark into the teeth of the fiercest gale. He pvs through mountainous wes. He makes a highway wre no path exists, but wn he draws near the blers of his own country a comes in sight of land, hs less careless of danger a he approaches the haven th he seeks with careful scdings, for he knows the trchery of currents, eddies a hidden reefs, and he has nliking for the graveyard ohips.

hen navigation first beg to be a trade, the sailors groping for harbor were gled by bonfires or flaming beacons on headlands o slands, and these were in turn replaced by pernent lighthouses. Today lighthouses protect every iortant harbor, and many a lonely rock or shoal is a marked.

he first lighthouse of which there is any record w built by Ptolemy II on the island of Pharos at th entrance to the harbor of Alexandria, Egypt. Pbably the most famous lighthouse of modern ties is the Eddystone Light, which was one of the fi built in Britain, and which has been famous bause of its dangerous situation and of its having bn four times destroyed by the angry waters of th North Sea. Minot's Ledge Light at the entrance to Boston Harbor is among the most noteworthy of Aerican lighthouses, and shares with Old Boston Lt the interest of every voyager who enters the tuous channel to the city of Boston.

Old Boston Light

The keepers of the Light and their families

oston Light, which celebrated its two hundredth aiversary on September 14, was the first lighthouse built in America, and is one of the most important in the North Atlantic. In the days of the old windjammer, the sailor beating his way across tempestuous Massachusetts Bay or running before a driving storm, looked longingly for the white column by day and the great light by night, for he knew that beyond the light lay the safe channel.

The first light was kindled Friday, September 14, 1716, by George Worthylake, who, with his wife and daughter, was shortly afterward drowned. In this early day the light-keeper was also health officer of the port, and his duties included the piloting of vessels into the harbor and the saving of life. The first lighthouse was burned and rebuilt again in 1720. The lighthouse and other buildings were again burned and rebuilt in 1751. In 1776 the British, driven from Boston by Washington's victorious army, destroyed the lighthouse as they sailed away. It was rebuilt again by the State of Massachusetts in 1780. In 1790 the lighthouse was formally turned over to the Federal government. It stands on a rugged island, the outpost of the dangerous reef which made the entrance to Boston Harbor a precarious adventure before the light was established. In stormy weather the keepers are often marooned on the island for days at a time, and when the northeaster blows the waves frequently dash completely over the island and its buildings. The office of keeper is not a job for a faint heart, yet at present the little island apparently harbors two happy families. The present lighthouse is the same one that was built in 1780, although it has been once partly rebuilt.

The Lord's Business

IF the question were asked offhand, "What is the world's biggest business?" it would puzzle even the most intelligent and best informed to give an immediate answer. In this age of "big business," there are so many vast enterprises, industrial and otherwise, with such wide ramifications and employing literally armies of workers, that one would have to be as wise as Solomon to settle the question even to his own satisfaction. Among the big businesses today we may reckon building, finance, oil, gas, railroads, agriculture, automobiles, moving pictures, dry-goods, real estate, packing houses, the steel industry and many others of such large proportions that it would be a gigantic task to set up a comparison which would prove at all satisfactory. A writer in a contemporary turns the searchlight of inquiry on what he regards as the greatest business in the world today and declares it to be Christianity-building. It certainly is a novel suggestion that the promulgation of the Gospel and of what it implies should outrank all others in its world-wide universality, its home and foreign missions, its churches, meeting houses and mission stations, its adherents estimated at nearly 600,000,000 and growing at the rate of a million a year, its army of 50,000 missionaries at work and its hosts of subordinate workers and helpers, its expenditure of $100,000,000 a year in heathen lands, and its vast administrative forces; its thirty thousand schools, its mission hospitals giving millions of medical treatments yearly. Yet there is sound reason for placing it in competition with all other businesses. It is the "King's business," and it is immense, almost beyond computation.

What a great thought there is in this, that with all its troubles and vexations and wranglings and disputes, its wars, its litigations and its mad race for wealth, this old world of ours after all should be so largely given over to the best of all businesses—the business for which God himself designed it! Now it has spread to the remotest parts of the earth. Let us think of this whenever we hear discouraging views expressed concerning the growth of Christianity. It is a glorious reflection that so large a proportion of the world's population is engaged in "seeking first and foremost the kingdom," and making all other considerations of worldly welfare tributary to this great and high purpose.

The New Indictment of Alcohol

IN many parts of the country the summer now waning has been marked by spells of intense heat and many prostrations. Several leading physicians of Chicago, who were commissioned to conduct an investigation into the causes of these prostrations, found that an almost universal predisposing cause is addiction to the use of alcohol. Of 155 heat-stroke cases treated at the county hospital, 98 per cent. were directly traceable to the use of alcoholic stimulants. In these cases the mortality was 44 per cent. At the close of their observation, the doctors came to the conclusion that in hot weather alcohol assumed the character of a virulent poison. "Beer and booze," they explain, increase the supply of bodily heat and lower the powers of resistance; and the regulating center in the brain becomes deranged, culminating in prostration. They found also that many alcoholic victims were heavy meat-eaters—another tributary cause of heat-stroke in a season of high temperature. In a number of cases the temperatures of victims of this class were found to have been forced up from normal (98.6 degrees) to 110, 112 and even 114—in fact, beyond the registering capacity of medical thermometrical tubes. There were patients whose skins, as one doctor explained, felt "like hot roast to the touch." The death toll of alcoholism in a single hospital made a powerful impression upon the minds of the entire medical staff.

If this were only the story of a revolution of opinion affecting a single group of physicians, it would still be of sufficient importance for comment; but it is one of many instances in which the public is constantly receiving new enlightenment concerning the effects of alcohol upon the individual and the community. One by one the old-time arguments in its favor are being disproved by accurate scientific investigation. In a report on 2,000,000 cases, issued by American and Canadian life insurance companies, and covering an investigation during the last twenty-five years, the conclusion is reached that constant users of alcohol shorten their lives by six years on an average. In the light of these figures, and considering the scope of the inquiry on which they are based, one need hardly be skeptical of the further statement that in the United States every year between 60,000 and 70,000 persons die from the effects of alcohol—a waste of human life representing one death every eight minutes, or 8 per cent. of the total mortality of the nation.

Surely this is an indictment which should give rise to serious reflection on the part of those who are still unconvinced of the danger of tampering with so deadly a foe.

The Value of Today

YESTERDAY is dead; tomorrow is unborn; it is today alone that is ours, that is ever with us, and that makes up our lives and eternity as single grains of sand make up the boundless beach of the seas.

Born between two heartbeats and dying as instantaneously; ever ending only to begin again; filling the space between the limitless past and limitless future without ever merging into either; passing with the swiftness of a weaver's shuttle and like it fashioning the fabric of our lives; dropping one by one into the ocean of time as precious pearls might slip from a silken cord into some fathomless pool; as unfaltering in its flight as is the motion of the earth on its axis, and ever bearing our life with it from one eternity to another—there is nothing more real, nothing more elusive, than this period of time we call "today."

Life for a day is but an epitome of a lifetime.

We wake in the morning with no knowledge of where our souls have been wandering while the senses slept; with fresh vigor and interest we enter upon the occupations of our daily work and fulfil our duties with an energy that begins to fail as the evening shadows lengthen· as darkness deepens weariness comes upon us, and at last we are glad to lay aside our work and cares, and to surrender ourselves to the sleep that spirits our souls back again to the unknown.

Each day has its own allotted task—no more. It is only when we go beyond that which is given us for the day, and force the mind and body to do things not worth while; when we are not content to bear the evils of the day, but harass ourselves with anticipations of those the future may bring; when we are not satisfied with the "daily bread" for which One wiser than we taught us to pray, but strive to lay up a useless surplus to leave behind; when the pleasures that were given us to enjoy in wholesome moderation degenerate into wild excesses—it is only then that outraged nature takes revenge for the neglect of her laws, and sanitariums and lunatic asylums are filled with the victims of ill-regulated lives.

Today is a small space—only a lightning flash in the dark. But of all the uncharted ocean of eternity it is all that is really ours.

Today exacts little of us; but as we do that little well or ill we weave the warp and woof of our success or failure.

The duties of today are small; but as our todays add into month and year and lifetime, our daily deeds too accumulate into mighty forces for good or ill.

CHARLES GRANT MILLER.

An Unexplained Back-Down

WHEN Great Britain set out to censor the journals of the world, to interfere with the mails of enemy and neutral nations and incidentally to blacklist a long line of American merchants and seriously hamper American trade by sea, she adopted a policy which could not be expected to pass unchallenged. Consequently the recent vote in the United States Senate on the Emergency Revenue Bill—by which that body approved the bill and sent it to conference—was generally anticipated. The amended bill gave extraordinary powers to the President to take measures for the protection of American trade, and even for retaliation where deemed advisable. He might retaliate, acting through the proper channel, by withholding clearance from the vessels of any offending nation, even using the forces at his disposal to carry such rulings into effect. The bill also provided for the prohibition of imports from countries that do not afford the usual facilities of commerce in times of war to American ships or American shippers. Common sense in diplomacy should have indicated such an outcome to those foreign governments that are responsible for the oppressive measures against American trade, American merchants and American mails. The English attitude was grossly overdone for the benefit of British trade, and for us to go on protesting further would have been he wasted.

We are fully appreciative of the exigencies of ar conditions, and would oppose no objections to ie reasonable exercise of the customary rights of a country at war in such cases. But no equate reason can be adduced for the treatr nt afforded to the commerce and mails of ne al nations, all of which have suffered heavy l es through the unreasonable and inexcusable assu ption of authority to override neutral rights at nvenience. As the leading neutral power among he nations, it became our duty to take steps to en in intolerable situation.

Just before adjournment it became known at the Revenue Bill had been amazingly modifie in conference, and that the amendments providing or retaliatory steps to be taken by the President ag st countries interfering offensively with American ils had been eliminated. Only one retaliatory am dment—that providing for the withholding of c arance from foreign vessels in American port -is retained. Just how this eleventh-hour change i he temper and attitude of Congress came about is ot clearly explained. On the floor of Congress it as been characterized as a shameful surrender. If is be true, and if there is no appeal against the conti ed gross injustice to American trade, American erchants and the mail of American citizens, ther he whole country should know it.

Mirage-Hunters

ENSIGN FITZHUGH GREEN of the U ed States navy recently returned from a prolo ed Arctic expedition, one of the objects of w ch was to verify the discovery of the new continent k wn as Crocker Land. He brings back to civilizatio he intelligence that there is no Crocker Land, and at the continent which Rear-Admiral Peary thoug he had found was a mirage, a dream; the mountains nd valleys he beheld but was unable to approac an optical illusion. Ensign Green and his assoc tes themselves encountered mirages while in the A ic. which dissolved as they drew nearer. In the grea ea of life there are mirages that beckon us. They m real and are delightfully inviting. Many a ut heart has been lured by their beauty only to find m unsubstantial things of air, freaks of the light, w ch fade like the Peary continent when we attem to test their reality. There are beautiful drea of youth which vanish as the years go by, leavin no trace; air castles, visions of wealth, of fame nd power that become intangible and are swept ay by the winds of fortune. Experience, growing wit he years, gives us a better focus, and we learn to istinguish the false from the true. To many, how er, this power of discrimination never comes; the remain lifelong dreamers and mirage-hunters, reali ng, perhaps only with the last ebb of vitality, that ey have spent their span in grasping at shadows and ve missed the substance.

Comment by the Way

THE Episcopal Bishop of Cork, Ireland, recently sai "I think it is a cause of extreme gratitude to Almight od to know that there are now throughout Europe no fewe an 600 Jews who are engaged in preaching the Gospel of C ist. And the work of those Jews is having a tremendous eff on those among whom they are witnessing for their Maste It is also a remarkable thing that out of the entire Jewish p lation thousands of Jews have forsaken Judaism and have t ned to Christianity. That is a marvelous result for a peopl ike the Jews. It shows not only the success of missions to Jew out it gives a wonderful object lesson as to the effect of the G pel of Jesus Christ as the power of God unto salvation—a wer which is sufficient, as no other power can be, to satisfy the longings and cravings of the human heart."

FRANCE is already planning for the restoration of wns now ruined, in process of being ruined, or about be ruined by the operations of the war. French cities ich have escaped the destruction of war are making them ves responsible for the restoration of those less fortunate. Ly s is thus to be godmother to the city of Lille, which is just c ing under the fire of French guns. Weak Rails Cause Death

ONE of the silent but steady sources of danger in railway travel is the litting of the steel rails that form the acks. Owing to an unseen flaw in its xture the iron under the terrific presre of daily use gives way, and a wreck the result. In 1912 fifty-two passngers were killed and 1,065 injured rough broken rail accidents, and the me cause resulted in losses of over ur million dollars. It will be good ws to the public and to railroad comnies that Dr. Dudley, the expert of e New York Central, has announced improved process of manufacture which an almost flawless rail can be ade. More care and time in the rolling ocess will make a metal that will stand e strain of travel. It is in the fire that e temper is made for metals and for en. The hard things of life are seldom elcomed by us, and yet they are the ings that make us able to stand the ily strain of life without breaking. ffering, sorrow, pain, lonely bearing burdens—these are the experiences t of which there comes a refined life, ady for helpfulness and loving service. Behold, I have refined thee, . . . I have ed thee in the furnace of affliction." (sa. 48 : 10.)

aithful Army Horse Honored

FOXHALL, Faithful Army Horse, Died January 10, 1916, at the ge of 38." This is the mark on a tombone at Fort Sam Houston in Texas, d it tells in few words the long faithful cord of one of God's noblest animals, d the affection in which he had enrined himself among the men of the rt. In 1889 he was purchased for the my, and thereafter for twenty-four ars he was in active service in various tillery batteries. He served in Cuba, d later made a 1,000-mile march with s regiment. In 1913 Secretary Garson placed him on the retired list—the ly animal ever so treated. During the ter years of Foxhall's service his duties ere to haul supplies from the quarrmaster's storehouses to the bread tchen. He made these rounds without driver. He would go with a written quisition, back up to the different orehouses, get his supplies and bring em back to the kitchen, being always warded at the bakery with a small loaf of bread. He never tired of the duties of the post life, and was the pride of the soldiers. John Wesley expressed the fervent belief that he would see his faithful white mare again in heaven. There is a great gulf fixed between the best of the animals and human persons, and we cannot tell what are the springs of action that make a horse patiently faithful to its work, but we can learn from it a lesson of loyalty to duty for ourselves. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life." (Rev. 2 : 10.)

Limit to Cold Storage

NEW JERSEY has just passed a law compelling sellers of all food that has been in cold storage more than thirty days to put large placards on it announcing the fact. This will protect the public from those dangerous foodstuffs which have had their appearance preserved by the freezing process, but which are not fresh. The refrigerator has done much to bring a wide variety of foods to our tables. From California and Florida, Maine and Minnesota, we exchange our fruits and foods. Cold storage, too, has made possible an equalization of supply with standard prices for all, but there are limits to the good that comes from artificial preservation, and it is well that there should be a regulation of the matter by law. In the spiritual world there is no preserving process for our food. There are no great cold storage systems by which the soul's nourishment can be kept out of all contact with life and thawed out a little at a time for use. God's manna comes to those who seek it each day, and it will not keep. The freshness of each day's morning sees it like the dew on the face of the ground, but when the sun waxes hot it melts. "And Moses said, It is the bread which Jehovah hath given you to eat. And let no man leave of it till the morning." (Ex. 16 : 15, 19.)

Christian Endeavor in Japan

THIS picture shows Dr. Francis E. Clark on his recent visit to Japan—his trip around the world—in the interest of the world-wide Christian Endeavor Movement. He founded this thirty-five year ago, and though now over sixty years of age, he still inspires and guides it in all the countries of the earth. From a small beginning in his church in Portland, Me., it has now grown to number millions of young Christian men and women of different races, languages and cultures, all of whom look to him as their adviser and leader in this work. The other American in the picture is Dr. James H. Pettee, a missionary in Japan, who has for a quarter of a century been the leader of Christian Endeavor in that empire. Born in the same year as Dr. Clark, he was a collegemate and a close friend, and from him caught the contagion of interest in young people, and through all these years he has been the dominant spirit of the movement which now numbers over a hundred societies, with some 3,000 members in Japan. On the right, opposite to Dr. Clark, sits Mr. Tokutomi, the editor of the Kokumin Shimbun (People's Daily), a great Tokyo newspaper with a circulation of 300,000. Mr. Tokutomi is one of the most able and progressive editors in the East, and his appearance with these Christian leaders speaks well for the attention which this movement will get in the daily press. A recent phase of all Christian activity in Japan is the use of the secular columns for paid space in which sermons and Bible lessons appear. Several denominations are making a wide and successful use of this "Newspaper Evangelism" and the attitude of the Japanese press has been generally most friendly and cooperative. Christianity is recognized even by those who do not accept it as a great moral force for good. It is a most inspiring thing to see such men as Dr. Clark and Dr. Pettee laughing at the encroachments of age, wearing their white hair as a silver crown, with youth in their hearts and an imperishable freshness of joy and hope in their faces, leading the forces of Christian youth on to moral and spiritual victory. It well suggests the prophet's vision: "And it shall come to pass, that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; . . . your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions." (Joel 2 : 28.)

Giant Gyroscopes Steady Ships

A WAY has at last been found to counteract the pitching and rolling of vessels at sea. In the stern of the ship a great wheel is set in motion and on the principle of the gyroscope it holds the vessel in a forced equilibrium against which even the worst waves have but a slight effect. The largest of these wheels is now being cast for the United States government for use on a transport vessel, and when in place it is to turn at the rate of eleven hundred revolutions a minute. The casting of this metal was a most delicate task, but it has been successfully finished. Other boats in the navy have already been provided with gyroscopes and the stabilizing effect has been remarkable. Submarines are also being equipped with them, and the principle is to be applied to aeroplanes. Not only comfort to passengers will be gained by this steadier of ships, but safety to cargo as well. Ever since the beginning of the world men who have ventured on the deep have been at the mercy of the restless tossing of the sea, and those boats were considered best that adjusted themselves most completely to the motion of the waves. Now, by a stronger counteracting force within, the great ships will hold an even keel across the wild and pitching sea. With just such an equipment of conscience and judgment has God fortified men, so that they need not be tossed about by every wave and wind of popular thought and action and ideal, but may hold a true course on an even keel across life's pathless track into the future. Faith is the force in our lives that will give steadiness and stability to each day's living. "For he that doubteth is like the surge of the sea, driven and tossed." (James 1 : 6.)

State Singing Contest

A CONTEST has just been held in Denver, Colo., to determine the finest male singer and female singer in the state. Nearly 500 singers competed, and the event aroused a wide interest in vocal music. The voices of the two winners are recorded by a talking machine company and the proceeds from the sales is to go to a fund for free musical scholarships in the state. The contest is to be an annual thing from now on, and with elimination trials throughout the different cities it bids fair to equal in common interest the Maennerchor contests throughout Germany. There are numberless voices that have fine quality and power to please that have never been discovered, and this will help bring them to a wider range of service. We scarcely realize the good that has been done by Edison's discovery of the laws of reproducing sound. The music of the great composers sung by the great world masters has become the property of us all, and quite unconsciously the musical requirements of the people of our country are beng raised by this means. Everything that means a refinement of our emotions means a strengthening of our wills to nobler action, and in music we have the twofold inspiration to feel and act. In the human voice lies the touch to every vibrant chord of our memories and our dreams and with good music we make better men and women. It is no accident that music has always formed a vital part of men's worship of God, and that in the pictures we have of heaven there is always a great singing choir. "Jehovah hath comforted Zion: joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody." (Isa. 51 : 3.)

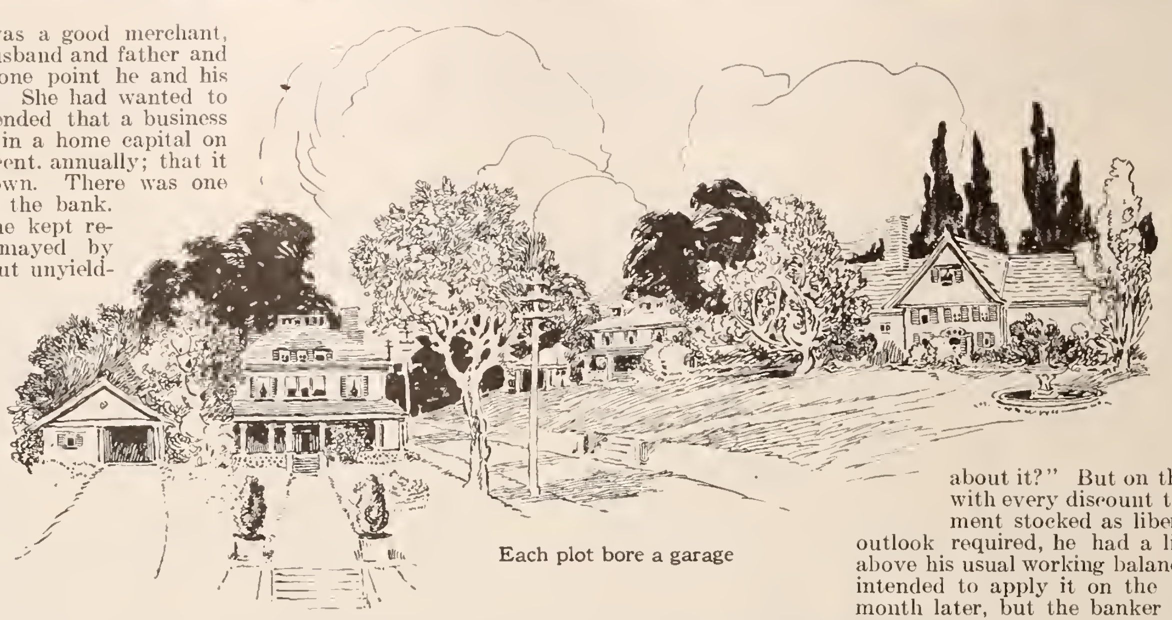
Enforcing all the Laws

A STRANGE situation has developed in Virginia, where a new regulation makes officers of the law responsible for the enforcement of all laws. The strict carrying out of this rule by fearful or it may be waggish police officers has resulted in a number of curious arrests under an old Sabbath observance law of a century ago. Under this law that no unnecessary work shall be done on Sunday one church organist has been arrested, a florist who supplied flowers to a church, a man who gave another gasoline for his automobile, and various others who were engaged in doing sundry little things for themselves. The courts cannot agree, it is said, as to what is really necessary work. In Christ's day, too, the law attempted to direct the use of the Sabbath, not by positive as much as by prohibitive legislation, and the result was a state of superstitious fear of unwittingly breaking some rule, coupled with an utter disregard of the spiritual uses of the day. Against this idea of the Sabbath Jesus directed his heaviest invectives. He taught great constructive motives that would lead men to an intelligent use of the Sabbath. To rest, to worship, to serve—these were the main uses which he taught. "The Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath." (Mark 2 : 28.)

The Vagabond Sale

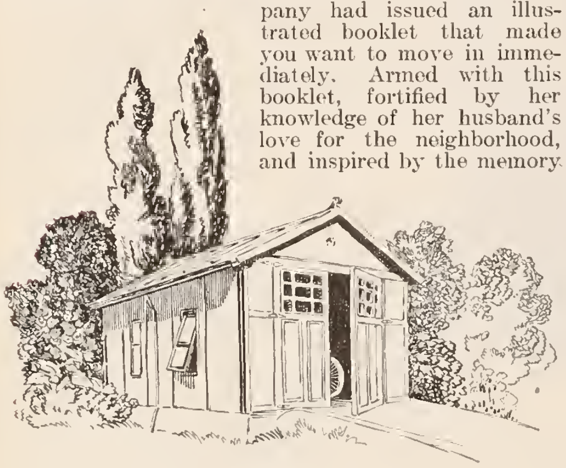
By
LOUIS E. ORCUTT

EBENEZER BROWN was a good merchant, a good man, a good husband and father and a good fellow; but on one point he and his wife had never agreed. She had wanted to own a home and he had contended that a business man could not afford to tie up in a home capital on which he could net fifteen per cent. annually; that it was cheaper to rent than to own. There was one other reason, too; a note at the bank. Nevertheless, as women do, she kept returning to the subject, undismayed by eighteen years of considerate but unyielding firmness.



Each plot bore a garage

Now she had prepared a new attack, or, to be more exact, one had been prepared for her. The growing little city in which Ebenezer Brown's general store was fast becoming a department store was sprouting a new addition in the hills along the river road. These hills had long been a favorite recreation ground for the Browns, and they felt a measure of proprietorship in every path and knoll and shaded slope and widening view. The development company was building houses and selling houses and plots ready for use, even to flower beds and gardens and folding clothesracks. What was more, each plot bore a garage built on lines similar to the house to which it belonged, and, finally, the company had issued an illustrated booklet that made you want to move in immediately. Armed with this booklet, fortified by her knowledge of her husband's love for the neighborhood, and inspired by the memory of the long years of frequent moving with no spot she could call her own, Mrs. Brown one evening in early September presented the subject of a home.



He considered it a rather deceptive illusion

"No, Florence, I've told you I couldn't afford to tie up money in a home."

She had expected this answer. "But, Eben, see. It is our old picnic ground, and the houses are just what we've always wanted, and everything is so nice, and you know I've always felt that we should have our own home. And just look at this house. It looks like your mother's home in Maine, but it's as modern as hers is old-fashioned, and it has the cutest little garage."

"Lots of use we'll have for a garage! A home is one thing, but an automobile is another thing; and I'd like to know what good a garage is without a machine."

"Oh, Cæsar [Eben Junior's great Dane] could sleep there, and Eben could use it for his bicycle and tools and tinkering, and you don't know but what we might get a machine some day. If we did we'd be ready for it. But, then, that's only an extra that's thrown in. The house is the main thing—the home. You know we're thinking of moving anyway, and, Eben, dear, I do wish we could make this move the last."

Mr. Greeley had delved deeply into men's souls

"EBEN, dear," was not aware that "we" were thinking of moving, but then he seldom had been aware of it until the wagons had backed up to the door. Once, in fact, the moving had been accomplished without his knowledge, an unfortunate oversight indeed, and he had gone home at night to a vacant house and had spent an anxious half-hour locating his legal residence. He had been very happy in every domicile the family had ever called home; but he had left the matter of choice to his wife and had followed her leading so long as it meant rent. It was when she talked buying that he set his facts in order and prepared his argument against the burying of capital in a home. Now he again marshaled his forces, but this time he found it harder to be convincing, for that house did resemble the old home in Maine, and he did like those woods; in fact, he had always planned to have a home there when he retired from business. With these elements of weakness in his armor he was really little surprised to hear himself agreeing to go with his wife the next afternoon to look over the offerings in the new addition.

Ebenezer Brown liked the house and it had been planted on the particular knoll that was his favorite—the one with the view down the longest sweep of the river. The company asked $1,000 down, and the balance in monthly payments no greater than the rent they had been paying, and the agent grew eloquent over the garage and the ease with which it could be approached. Cæsar sniffed it over inside and out and lay down on the threshold as if claiming his property. And Eben Junior grew ecstatic when he found it had a cement floor, a water faucet and electric lights.

THE agent, having completed his most eloquent selling talk for the second time, with an extra flourish on the garage and the privet-hedge, which at that instant was represented by a row of forlorn-looking sticks bordering the lot (the hedge, not the garage), drew his train of thought toward the logical conclusion.

"Would ten o'clock be too early for me to bring the contract in tomorrow morning, Mr. Brown?" he asked. Mr. Brown hesitated, then started to say he was not buying, that he only intended to rent; but his wife, with a sudden inspiration, asked him if he had noticed how clearly Overton's Landing, twenty miles down the river, could be seen from the southeast chamber. He reluctantly admitted that he had not, and she would not be satisfied until he had climbed the stairs and had admitted that he saw the two tall poplars that marked the landing. However, he was not ready to say that he would sign that contract, and when the agent repeated his question in the affirmative form, assuring Mr. Brown that, if it was not too early, he would be on hand at ten o'clock, Brown only said he would see about it, and his wife wisely refrained from mentioning the house or the purchase for the rest of the day.

Ebenezer Brown had the $1,000; that was another weak place in his armor. He had intended to use it to reduce a loan of $5,000 which he had been carrying at the bank for several years. He felt that the borrowed money was worth keeping, for he paid eight per cent. for it, and he had never made less than ten per cent. net out of it. It has been stated that Brown was a good merchant. Yet, somehow, he felt guilty every time he signed a paper which read, "Ninety days after date I promise to pay." He had now $25,000 of his own money in the business, and he usually earned fifteen per cent. net or better on the whole $30,000. He considered the loan good business, and the bankers apparently agreed, for it was a couple of years at least since either of them had indulged in any harmless easantry about re cing it the next ti e it was up for re wal. Brown did not now that, six mont before, the presic it of the bank had sked the cashier if believed Brown was making money The cashier had lied that Brown ried a creditable t ance and that no llections were com in. "Well, then," s the president, vhy doesn't he pay mething on that n, or at least say som hing about it?" But on this September m ing, with every discount taken and every partment stocked as liberally as Brown f the outlook required, he had a little more than ,000 above his usual working balance in the bank. had intended to apply it on the note, which was ue a month later, but the banker appeared indiffe t to payment; and he had often suggested to Bro the advantage, from a credit standpoint, of ow g a home. Brown had been obstinate; he hac been really stubborn about it; but now—perhaps it ight be worth while to consider it.

THE salesman was on hand at 9:59 the next orning, and he gave his selling talk in the sho form as he passed over the contract, not forgetti the garage, which was the icing on the cake, and hich came nearer being the frosting on the deal th the salesman knew. The much-stressed garage w the one thing in the whole deal that chafed El ezer Brown. He classed it with trading stamps an ther premiums, and wished he knew where he was ying for the thing. He knew it was being charg for somewhere; but then it had been some time si the Brown domicile was large enough for both Cæs and Eben Junior and the rest of the family, and, a way, he had decided to make the plunge. He took t contract, read it carefully, insisted on some minor c nges which necessitated more or less telephoning bef the salesman could agree to them, and finally pic d up his fountain pen and slowly signed his name the line which the salesman had kindly pointed out him as many as six times. Then he went to his w , got out his check book, and made out a check for ,000. He held up the check when it was written, and oked it over, as a woman does the son who is off to m e his way in the world, and then, with the air of one king the ultimate, supreme sacrifice, he handed the ip of paper to the salesman and took the contract, king it up in the bond-box of his safe.

BARGAIN SALE
IN SAFE CO
The sales sli totaled $11,65 2

For once Ebenezer Brown knew that the mily was going to move; in fact, he was most insistent upon immediate action. Having tested the water, he was anxious to get in all over; and three days later he sat in his bedroom at sunset looking ɔwn the river toward Overton's Land- g. But he didn't sit long; for, from mewhere down stairs, he heard his ife calling to know if he had the key the garage. Eben Junior wanted to ıt his bicycle away. He had it.

" Say, boy, open the door so the tire'll show

About a week later, as Brown turned to his yard, he was startled to notice tire just showing through the slightly ɔened garage door. It somehow an- ɔyed Brown, for he did not care to have ighbors think he would own a garage erely to house a bicycle. He made a ental note to tell Eben to keep the ɔors closed.

A FEW days later Brown received a quite unexpected letter from Mr. reeley, advising him that, in accord with new policy recently adopted, the bank quired that every customer clean up s loans at least once a year, and that would therefore expect the $5,000 ɔte, due October 3, to be paid in full. rown was stunned. He had not ex- ected this, was not prepared for it, ıd did not know of any way in which could get that amount of money in o weeks. He put on his hat and ent up to the bank as fast as he could ake a pair of wobbly knees function. e had had some hard pinches twenty ars before, but in all his business reer he had never had a loan called. e sort of dribbled into Mr. Greeley's ivate office; and the hand that opened e letter shook as he asked in a thin r-away voice what it meant.

Mr. Greeley had delved too deeply to men's souls in that little room to il to translate accurately the struggle hich possessed the spirit of Brown. He as kindly, he was genial, but he was m. He explained to Mr. Brown how note carried from year to year became ally a permanent investment in the ısiness, but a permanent investment ıving the nature of a preferred stock- ɔlder; he showed him how foreign such ermanent investment was to the real ırpose of banking; and he told him ıat bankers felt that if the loan could paid up once a year it should be, and if couldn't be paid up once a year without ıdangering the business of the bor- wer, it ought not to be loaned at all.

Brown's knees were steadier as he ft the bank. His first impulse was go to the bank across the square and ansfer his account. The president of ıe other bank had often suggested ıat he would be happy to have Mr. rown's business if he ever felt it de- rable to change; but instead he went see his attorney and get his advice. ıdge Washburn listened to the state- ent of the case and to Brown's sug- stions regarding the transfer of the count. He said "No" to that at ıce. "Brown," he said, "those banks ɔn't like each other, but on matters of edit they work together like a hand in glove. If you go to Davidson and y to arrange to open an account he ill keep you talking while Murphy ɔes into the back room and calls up reeley. Greeley will tell him that he ıs called your loan, and your credit ill be gone at both banks. You can't ford to do it. Now, see here. How g a stock have you got on hand?"

Brown replied that he had about 45,000 worth of stock at cost value, etween $55,000 and $60,000 at his sual retail price.

"Well, then," said the judge, "my lvice to you is to pull off the biggest ıle you have ever planned in your life. ou have done things, before now, that ıd never been done before. Now ɔ it again. If you haven't quite the ıll $5,000 when the note is due, come ɔ me and I'll get the balance for you. ou can't afford to let any one else in ɔwn know the circumstances."

Brown grasped the judge's hand with grip of resolution, and he called his ead clerk into his private office as soon s he got back to the store. He asked im what they had in stock that ought ɔ be turned into cash. The clerk nswered "Everything," and after this ıstomary pleasantry they took down ıe stock-book and went through it em by item. Ebenezer Brown was ırprised to find what a volume of lmost out-of-date merchandise was in is stock. He went to two or three epartments and verified the stock- ook, and then he and Robinson began ɔ figure.

They called it the "Vagabond Sale" because it was its declared purpose to move on a lot of loafers that had made a hang-out of Brown's store one day too long. They made the prices attractive, but they made the advertising more attractive; and the aisles groaned under the crowds of buyers that for two weeks struggled to reach the counters.

ON October 2, the last day of the sale, the sales slips totaled just $11,659.42, and every loafer in the stock was sold except some last summer's straws that should have been returned to the wholesale milliner but had been overlooked. There was more than $9,000 clear cash in the bank, and Ebenezer Brown told Robinson to send those hats to the Fresh Air Home; they would shade faces and necks if they wouldn't sell.

Ebenezer Brown's knees were quite firm when he approached the bank on October 3, and he accepted Mr. Greeley's welcoming smile as a just tribute to one who was worthy of the confidences reposed in him. When he came out of the bank he met Eben Junior unexpectedly, almost at the door. Father and son walked down the street together in silence until they were greeted by a blatant call from an auto horn and saw one of Eben Junior's young friends go sailing by in his new runabout.

"Say, dad, why can't we have one of those?" asked Eben Junior.

"Just what I was wondering myself, boy," replied the father. "Do you know how much they cost?"

"Sure; Phil's there cost about a thousand, but there are good ones for less."

A week later Ebenezer Brown, with Ebenezer Junior sitting proudly beside him, drove a medium-priced, five-passenger car into the little garage, alighted and walked toward the house.

When they were half way to the kitchen door, Eben Junior stopped and listened. "You left her running, dad," he said.

"I know it, boy. Sounds good to me to hear it purr. Say, boy, run back and open the door so the tire'll show."

Outside of Criticism

MISSIONARY R. A. HUME, of the American Marathi Mission, Ahmednagar, India, writes: "The last foreign mail brought me your favor of April 19, enclosing check for which I heartily thank you. It is marvelous the service which the Christian Herald continues to render to India and to those who once were famine orphans, or who now are Christians in need, or are being trained in industrial schools or educated for usefulness in Christian work. There are three young persons for whom I provisionally plan to use this gift. One is the son of a worthy widow, whose husband died two years ago leaving a large family and considerable encumbrances of debt. This leader was almost the most influential native Christian of western India. The youth in question is his third son—a good, promising, manly fellow, who cannot possibly get an education unless he is aided. The second is the eldest son of the assistant superintendent of my district. His father is a godly, faithful man, who has steadily done Christian service for many years, and longs to have his first-born get a better education than he (the father) himself had. The third youth is the son of another Christian widow. This boy's father was a Brahman village clerk. He felt the need of peace for a troubled soul. He walked nearly a thousand miles to Benares, the sacred city, accepting food, but never begging. No peace came to him, but only disgust at what he saw of the priests at Benares. After returning from that pilgrimage he came across Christians, heard of Christ, found peace, became a Christian and later a preacher. After his death I looked after the widow and her three sons. While the awful war causes many Indians to criticize Christendom and so-called Christian nations, no one criticizes the Lord Jesus Christ."

First aid to the hungry

Safe to say that half the dyspepsia would be banished from the world—and a large share of our other troubles along with it—if every dinner began with a good soup.

When the "men folks" or any of the "business" part of the family come home fagged out with the day's work, when the young people come romping in from their studies or their play—ravenous and impatient, when the homekeepers, weary with their own burdens, feel almost "too tired to eat"—the one thing which brightens up the situation like magic is a delicious steaming plate of

Campbell's Tomato Soup

You can have it ready in almost "no time" without the least trouble or fuss.

It provides immediate nourishment of the most wholesome and inviting kind. It dispels the fatigue of hunger, stimulates the flow of digestive juices, tones and strengthens the stomach to digest a hearty meal.

Or you can prepare it readily with noodles, vermicelli, boiled rice, and in other hearty forms so that it often takes the place of a heavy meal and is in itself completely satisfying and sufficient.

All authorities agree that a good soup eaten every day does a work in the building up of the human body which no other food can accomplish so well.

Make it a point to serve such a soup regularly on your table, and you will be more than gratified by the far-reaching and beneficial results.

A Plot That Failed

International Sunday School Lesson for October 1. Act 23.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"They shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail." Jer. 1 : 19

As long as we are on the prepared path, speaking the divine word and performing the appointed mission, God is with us and we bear a charmed life. In one of the courts of Europe, the regalia lies on a table, with no apparent protection; but woe to the hand that attempts to touch it, because a strong force of electricity is constantly playing upon and engirdling it. So with the messenger of the Lord's sending. He defies his foes, is more than a conqueror, and dwells as within a munition of invisible rocks. More than once during the Boxer riots, the murderers visited every house in the street to discover the Christians, except the one or two where God's unseen sentry angel stood at the door. It may be t you have stepped back before some fea storm of opposition, as a fireman bef belching flames. Thus Cranmer signed recantation. Return again to your p give out again the old message, renew y former protest; and as you return to vacated position, the old blessing flood your soul, and God will bring again to stand before him and be as mouth. We are not promised immu from conflict. "They shall fight aga thee, but they shall not prevail." anvil shall break the hammer, as Waldenses put it. One with God be him is in a majority.

Paul Saves Himself and Is Saved by a Youth

By George D. Allison, D.D., Ph.D.

THIS lesson brings to us two more vivid incidents in the stormy career of the great Apostle to the Gentiles. The scene of the first is laid in the council chamber of the Sanhedrin, where Lysias the Roman chiliarch is presiding over a special session in an effort to get at the facts of this puzzling case. Of course, we have only the briefest account of what took place. The trial can hardly have begun with the plea of the accused. But Luke hastens to put the important happenings vividly before us. He shows us Paul, dignified, fearless, conscious of innocence, looking stedfastly upon the council and declaring his conscientious rectitude of life.

Paul's Colloquy with the High Priest

We see Paul in all his natural and human characteristics here. When Paul protested his innocence before God, the high priest angrily cried out an order to smite Paul on the mouth. It was a contemptible abuse of power on a bound prisoner and a gross insult as well. It branded Paul publicly as a liar. Paul's indignation flamed forth, and his usual humility was forgotten. In hot wrath he rebuked the unjust judge: "Sittest thou to judge me according to law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to law?" This outburst seems perfectly justifiable to most of us, though some Christian moralists have accused Paul of coming short of the standards of his Master here. Jesus himself, however, was capable of fierce indignation, as we know from his taking an oxwhip and driving the traffickers from this same temple. Only Jesus was absolutely unresentful toward those who abused him personally at his trial.

We have a feeling that Paul would have been just as indignant if some one else had been the victim of such overbearing tyranny. His outbreak with its quick recovery seems at least highly pardonable. We are sure the Roman commander respected him for it. How a little brief authority will show up a man's pettiness of soul! We feel that Ananias the high priest has branded himself forever. Few men are good enough to have absolute power over others. Slavery showed that. So does military life—every nation has the problem of the tyrannical and inhuman petty officer. One can see it too often in the police magistrate at the desk and the overseer of the poor at his work. But it goes further. How do we all conduct ourselves where we have our measure of power? What is our attitude to the servant in our house? Would Jesus approve it? Bitter complaint is made of the unreasonableness of Christian women toward weary shopgirls who are in their power because "the customer is always right." Some people seem to swell with self-importance as soon as authority is theirs and all their inherent meanness comes to the front.

Well, Paul quickly recovere his equanimity. He had not kno it was the high priest! What an i lied criticism of Ananias's priestlin is there! He could not imagine th high priest who interceded for sinne before God conducting himself so like a shepherd of Israel. Paul i plies that if he had known, he would ave restrained his sense of wrong He would have respected the office, t ugh he could not respect the holder it. All through his career he teac us reverence for law and order an sub-jection to the constituted auth ities whenever conscientiously possibl He would find much amiss in our land day on this score. He would deplore t lack of respect for authority and the uni rsal spirit of evading or "beating" th law. To love one's country for him me respect for her statutes and instit ons. He would deplore the bitterness a unfairness of much of our politic too. The misjudging of motives, th misrepresentation of facts are e ally hideous. From the chief mag rate of the nation to the unpaid o cials of the small town, what a deal unfair, ungrateful, unbrotherly eech they suffer. We have had too uch "mud-slinging." It has foste a spirit of pessimism and tended t lawlessness on the part of our citizen new and older. We too need Ex. 22 28—"Thou shalt not speak evil of ruler of thy people." It would be w for every teacher of youth and eve influential member of a family to et a conspicuous example in this ma r.

And how especially true this of a religious officer! To discredit th minister or deacons reflects on the urch and on the whole cause of Chri Is it not too often the case that ents and elders will dissect, not the mon merely, but the preacher; pick to eces also the characters of their fellow members in the church, until the ver children lose the respect and the con ence essential to their Christian pr ress? If all Christians made it a rule t peak well of the church and of the kers and members therein, and to e rcise a large charity and restraint in cri ism, the favorable advertising of hristianity would soon bring big ults. At least we may take for our rule hou shalt not speak evil." Better we realize the gain to our cause by ch ging the Jewish negative to Christ's firmative and "speak well" whenever can.

Ingenious Tactics

When Paul realized how little stice he could expect from the Sanhe n as then constituted, he resorted to stratagem—he divided his enemies. This he did by insisting that the hole theological controversy hinged the resurrection of Christ. It was gely a matter of the view one took the Messiahship and the "hope of I ael," of a general resurrection of the lead. The Pharisees would hold wit Paul that the vital question in refere e to his Gospel was his own credibi y as a witness on the Damascus ro and in his visions. There was hing inherently impossible to them his belief or his doctrine. The Sad cees.

o the other hand, scouted the whole
e ception of spirit surviving death, a professed themselves materialists, o t best agnostics. Paul's keen pere tion gives him his opening. "I am a 'harisee and the son of Pharisees.
T hope of the resurrection is the point a sue here." Instantly the Sanhedrin w plunged into confusion, and the d oute became so violent that the comm der feared Paul would be torn to p es. For the third time on that e ntful day, he was obliged to call upon t soldiers to rescue the daring preacher.
Al he, Lysias, was more mystified th n ever as to the true meaning of this w le controversy.

hat shall we say of Paul's tactics h ? Was it right for him to throw a ne of contention among his enemies?
I was a cunning ruse without foundati in the case, perhaps there might b some criticism of his conduct. But P l was perfectly sincere. This was t issue after all in a very genuine se e—faith in the unseen world—and h was justified in trying to secure a fa orable view by those whom he could in ence. It was clearly not his place t ubmit tamely to a biased court when, b a clever stroke, he could turn its fu upon itself.

e feel that we should not hesitate
b legitimate means to divide the ene-m s of religion, and especially to weaken t power of unjust persecutors. The st ies of Columba and Boniface in e y days, and of many a modern missi ary, show the ready wisdom and p tical common sense by which ene-m s were thwarted and the work freed f n unreasonable restrictions.

ut how different was Paul's strata m from the Jewish counterstroke!

F ting a Crime in the Interest of Religion low singular a commentary on reli ous history is the account of the c spiracy of the forty to assassinate P l! They were good Jews in their o n estimation and received the imp d sanction of the high priests upon t ir enterprise. The Sanhedrin aut rities actually agreed to cooperate i uring the prisoner within reach of t ambush. Ever and again we have w nessed in Christian history the offic l guardians of religion stooping to c t, exercising contemptible means t olster their own power, using even t dagger to eliminate the dangerous r ormer or innovator. From the bribe of Judas to the Spanish Inquisition a so on to our own times, we find t achery, force, torture used for soc ed religious ends. If it were not f the vitality of real faith and the n d of mankind for God, these misc ceptions of religion would long since h e resulted in the complete abolition o he very word "religion" itself.

e must utterly repudiate every mani tation of persecution and Jesuitry a e. The end does not justify the m ns. We may not do evil that good m y come. If a man's belief is bad it w not be altered by force. If it is d erent from ours it is not essential t Christianity that it be suppressed.
N t only so, but we must be very care-f in our combating of new ideas lest w be found fighting against God.

"hey must upward still and onward
Who would keep abreast of truth."

O of the chief difficulties of religion is hat process of hardening by which a churches and sects become impervi-o to new revelations of the everliving
G l. We are still stoning the prophets t ay. And some conservative and r erend men would advocate assassinat n still—not of the body nowadays, b of the reputation if not the soul.

A Young Man's Friendship

low pleasing it is to read of Paul's d iverance from the plotters by his o n nephew—Paul's sister's son. It b ngs the great apostle nearer to us in h nan contact as we realize he had a ister and a nephew at least, and in R m. 16 : 7 he mentions his relatives
A dronicus and Junia, who had shared p secution and prison with him. We s uld like to know more of his family.
T ey seem to have stood by him fairly w l. Did they all follow him out of J laism into Christianity? It seems likely, yet we do not know. At any rate, convert or not, this youth was devoted to his uncle, and when the plot leaked out and reached his ears he exercised good judgment and quick wit. His ready access to Paul in the citadel and the instant consideration of the commander showed the impression Paul had made.

One of the interesting personal points in the career of this great leader is his fascination for young men, several of whom figure prominently in his life. Of course we can think at once of Timothy and Titus, each called by Paul "my true child, mine own son." It seems altogether probable that Timothy was won to Paul's standard and thus to Christ's, during the stormy days of his first visit to Lystra (Acts 14 : 8-23). How the young lad must have admired the dauntless missionary who was stoned and left for dead outside the walls, yet arose and doggedly returned to the city! Missionaries are great material for boys' heroes. Titus likewise was a young convert of the Galatian tour, and became a trusted lieutenant, carrying letters, going on delicate missions, raising charitable subscriptions. The place of the youth in Paul's life is conspicuous indeed—John Mark, whom he so sharply rebuked, Onesimus the runaway slave, Demas the deserter who failed him in his hour of need, and Rufus (Rom. 16 : 13), whose mother was like a mother to Paul.

What a wonderful opportunity is set before the mature Christian in winning the allegiance of youth! In so doing he multiplies his own serviceableness to the Master. And personality, character, are prerequisites for eliciting youthful loyalty. To the boy, what you are speaks so loud that he cannot hear what you say. Your conduct will count when your admonitions seem to fall on deaf ears. Young fellows in the formative years are born heroworshipers. Dr. Forbush, in his fine book on the Boy Problem, tells beautifully of his two sons, who would rather be like Frank V— than any one else they knew. Their Sunday school teacher! What a gain for the church, the Christ and the boy when a lad's Sunday school teacher is his ideal and hero! What a foolish blunder for thousands of the teachers to fail to grasp the opportunity! One of the chief needs in the church is an army of devoted men, each of whom will be a big brother to half a dozen boys, winning their allegiance in school and home and off on tramps and trips, and centering all their loyalty in the Kingdom and the Lord Jesus Christ. But the class itself and the thoughtful friendship of a real Christian furnish opportunities enough. We may discover and bring to usefulness far greater Christians than ourselves. And how rewarding is the friendship of boys, making us young again, eliciting our forgotten enthusiasms, giving to us a real spiritual joy that cannot be taken away! One of the happiest retrospects of the Christian minister is to look back over the boys and girls who came to Jesus under his teaching, their temptations conquered by struggle, their eager ambition for school and college and business, the lifelong friendship of the chosen few.

Well, we leave Paul's nephew, that Jewish youth who saved for us years of Paul's life and those great epistles of the captivity, watching the dust of hundreds of soldiers guarding his uncle on to Rome and thinking, with a boy's grim humor, of those forty assassins who had sworn not to eat or drink till they had made their kill. Thanks to him, they will be hungry enough to break their oath ere long!

Parking a Volcano

UNCLE SAM has set aside 82,880 acres surrounding Mount Lassen and Cinder Cone, California, as a national park, to be known as the Lassen Volcanic National Park. Mount Lassen is the only active volcano in the United States. The park will contain a number of peaks, and includes the Devil's Half-Acre (which is a collection of hot springs and mud geysers), Bumpass, Morgan and other hot springs, besides seven lakes of water and some of volcanic glass, trout streams and forests; and—to insure variety and contrast—a few ice caves. Judging by the description, a person will be able to go on horseback to any degree of danger desired and return by the same method after being duly exhilarated.

For Women—Vivacity
For Children—Capacity
And Energy for Men

Nature stores for us in oat grains what we all need most.

For children, phosphorus and lecithin of which brains and nerves are made.

For grown-ups, vim, animation, spirit, and the power to do. Every dish of oat-flakes brims with latent energy.

This grain, which Nature favors so, is also made delicious. With flavor and aroma it is lavishly endowed.

Our part is to bring it to you in uniquely luscious form. Your part is to get it.

Quaker Oats

Vim-Food Made Doubly-Delicious

Oat grains are not alike. Some are rich and plump and flavory. Some are stunted and insipid.

We pick out just the queen grains. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. But those grains, when used alone, make most delicious flakes.

Real oat lovers don't serve lesser oat-food. From all the world over they send here for Quaker Oats.

Here it costs no extra price. Every grocer has it. Don't you think you should get this grade, when oats are so important?

A $2.50 Aluminum Cooker

Made to our order, extra large and heavy, to cook Quaker Oats in the ideal way. Send us our trademarks—the picture of the Quaker—cut from the fronts of five Quaker Oats packages, or an affidavit showing the purchase of five packages of Quaker Oats. Send $1.00 with the trademarks or affidavit, and this ideal cooker will be sent to you by parcel post prepaid. We require the trademarks or affidavit as assurance that you are a user of Quaker Oats. The trademarks have no redemption value. This offer applies to United States and Canada. We supply only one cooker to a family. Address The Quaker Oats Co., 1708 Railway Exchange, Chicago.

The Hub of Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I AM in the very heart of Alaska. Tanana claims to be the hub of the territory. It is a little town lying on the right bank of the Yukon just about half way between the Pacific and Arctic Oceans, and half way down the Yukon on its course from the international boundary at Eagle to its mouth, where it flows out into Bering Sea not far from St. Michael. Just opposite where my steamboat is anchored is the mouth of the Tanana River. It is a wide, sluggish stream, having a course of something like 600 miles from the Wrangell Mountains to where it flows into the Yukon. It will take me two days of steaming to go up it to Fairbanks, where the terminus of Uncle Sam's new railroad is to be.

The people here think that the railroad should be extended to Tanana. They claim that the Tanana River is not deep enough for large steamers, and that its sand bars and islands affect navigation. They say that if the road were so constructed as to cross the Yukon at the rapids about thirty-five miles above here the cost of bridging would be extremely low, and the road could then be run down the north bank of the river to Tanana, opening up a vast region lying to the west and north of the Yukon. This region has some of the richest placer deposits of Alaska, including those of the Koyukuk River. They assert that such a road would also open up the great farming possibilities of interior Alaska and would give direct access to the Yukon and its enormous tributary system.

There is no doubt that Tanana can offer room for all the population she may have in the future. The corporate limits at present are large enough to give an acre to every man, woman and child and leave some to spare. The town has 400 population, and it is scattered along the water front for more than a mile. At the lower end of it begins the army post of Fort Gibbon, which extends three miles farther.

The town consists of the post and the civil community. The latter has two churches, three hotels, six saloons and several large mercantile establishments. It has also a public school and a movie show. The buildings are of logs and boards, and the place on the whole is the largest and most prosperous of all on the Yukon River proper.

The people of Tanana are enthusiastic Alaskans. They have a chamber of commerce, consisting of boomers. They have a camp of the Arctic Brotherhood and a local organization known as the Loyal Order of the Moose. Talk to them about their village and they will make you think it a paradise, as beautiful as the Vale of Kashmir and as salubrious as Los Angeles. I asked Judge Dehn, the United States commissioner, who has been here twelve years, what he thought of the climate. He replied:

"I like it and I keep healthy and happy summer and winter. Our summers, which last from May until the middle of September, are more delightful than those of any part of the States. The thermometer ranges from forty-five to ninety degrees above zero, and for the most of the time there is scarcely an hour that you cannot read within doors. From June 15 to the 10th of July there is no real darkness, even at midnight."

"Give me some idea of your winter weather. It must be terribly cold."

"Not so bad. Not so bad," said Judge Dehn. "The weather keeps growing colder and colder from October on until it gets down to 15 degrees below zero. It holds that average throughout the winter, although it now and then falls to 40 and even 60 degrees below. I have seen it down to 73. Zero is hot winter weather and we do not consider 15 degrees below that point uncomfortable. At such time we wear our ordinary winter clothing and take off our coats if we are at hard manual labor. I came here from Canton, Ohio. Fifteen degrees below zero on the Yukon is ot as cold as 15 above in Ohio. Our a is dry and we do not feel the cold.

"Besides," continued Judge D n, "our houses keep out the cold. They re made of logs, chinked with arctic m s. The warmest building I have is my g chicken-house, which is lined and c d with a framework, the space betw en being filled with shavings. I keep n air-tight stove going in it, and y hens lay all winter."

Speaking of chickens, I have en greatly interested in how they re handled in these cold countries of he Far North. We brought 800 bloo d fowls on our ship down the Yu n. They had come from Seattle, and re consigned to a man in Fairbanks. T ey are still on the ship, and will go p the Tanana River tomorrow. At I y-son I met Chicken Billy, who at he time had 900 chickens, and who as sold eggs in the winter for as muc as $5 a dozen.

I have heard other stories almos as interesting. For instance, the chic ns imported from the States have to ve their days made of the same propor ns of light and darkness as at home b re they will lay. I heard of a ma at Circle, who imported a lot of fowls m the States with the idea of starti a chicken farm. After a week or so ey grew droopy. They lost flesh and h ot no eggs whatever. He was then ld the chickens were suffering from lac of sleep. It was midsummer, when he light is bright throughout the tw y-four hours. The chickens had no su et to mark their bedtime, and they kep on scratching gravel all night. The an decided to put them in darkened c ps at 8 P. M. and keep them so til morning. The hens at once rega ed their old vigor and began to op "ranch eggs," which sold for se ral dollars a dozen. I am told that the c ps must be lighted during the long rk days of the winter in order to m ke the hens lay.

In the past few years there has en a craze in Alaska in favor of the " p-ful hen." Most of the residents ve been keeping chickens and raising eir own eggs. At first many kept he chickens throughout the summer nd sold them as cold weather came to save the expense of warming and l t-ing the coops during the long w ter nights. They would then import a ec-ond flock for the following summer. o-day it is the custom to care for ur chickens in summer and put them ut to board in the winter. In Dawson nd Fairbanks there are a number of ch en boarding-houses where fowls are ed for at a regular rate. The usual ce for boarding a hen is $1 per season nd this includes feeding and keeping a well-warmed and well-lighted p. The eggs laid during the winter go t he landlord. As soon as the warm we er comes on the owner takes back his chickens and is thus able to ise broilers and pullets and at the same me have plenty of eggs.

Another interesting feature is chi en-killing time. This corresponds s ne-what with hog-killing time in the States. When the weather gets c it stays cold all winter. The thermo ter goes down to below zero and the w ole country is a cold storage plant til spring. This makes it so that mea an be kept in a frozen state throug ut the winter. Each householder, h ing decided how many chickens she ill put out to board, kills the balance. She cleans and dresses them and ngs them out of doors or in an unh ted building. They freeze solid th rst night and can then be laid away a cold place and be brought in to be ten as needed. I know of one woman ho has now 100 chickens. She will eep them till fall, when eighty will be led and the remainder be put out to b rd. That woman is sure of good chick all winter, and the meat will be far ter than that from our cold-storage plants.

In Dawson a butcher told me how they managed to have fresh meat all winter long. Said he:

"We bring our beef and mutton in on the hoof before navigation closes, and keep them until about the middle of October, after which time we are sure of a steady cold until spring. We then kill and dress them and hang them up out of doors just as you hang up beeves in a cold storage plant. We then lay them away and thaw them out as the market demands. We freeze caribou and moose the same way. Last year one of the butchers froze a caribou with the skin and horns on, and just as it looked when alive. He stood the carcass out in front of his shop, and used it for a sign."

Among other strange cold-weather features of this part of the world is watching the ice in the river to see when it will form, how deep it will freeze, and when it will go out in the spring. One of the river captains tells me he has measured the ice of the Yukon and found it at times five feet in thickness. The ice forms the great highway of travel in winter weather. Navigation opens at Dawson between the 6th and the 16th of May, and it usually closes about the 25th of October.

I find there is a difference of opinion as to the Alaska winters. All are not as enthusiastic about the delights of the cold and the darkness as those I have quoted.

"I tell you, the winters are awful," said one of the women of Fairbanks. "These people say they enjoy life when the thermometer is 20 or 30 degrees below zero, and that it is not cold. I tell you it is cold, although the still air does not make it so bitter.

"When it is more than twenty below, we women stay in the house, and the men as much as they can. We work by artificial light for the most of the day, and when spring comes every one is peaked and deathlike, and our complexions are pale. With the coming of the long days our color returns, and in summer we are as healthy and rosy as can be imagined.

"And then the long, dark days rack your nerves almost to breaking! You get tired of yourself and your friends and want something new in the way of amusement. You sleep as long as you can and pay but little attention to hours. All parties are held late, and they often last far into the night. And then the trouble of entertaining! Every one has the same supplies, and the same canned stuffs to select from. You go to your pantry and look at the shelves in despair. It is hard to know what to serve."

A Visit to the Bowery Misson

By Evangelist J. V. Williams

IT was my good fortune to attend the Bowery Mission some time ago, and I enjoyed a very spiritual service, such as Dr. Hallimond always has. The Bowery Mission is doing a great work in New York City. Years ago, when I attended occasionally, I saw a motley, ragged, dirty, drunken crowd; but now the men looked cleaner and sober. A large number of the "bum" element had really been converted; and hundreds of men who had been driven out from home, wife, and children by drink, were now living good Christian lives with their families. When Christ comes into the life, the home always thrives.

A strange thing has come to pass of late years. While the church has grown more formal than of old, the Mission is having live experience meetings, and converts are rejoicing in the Holy Ghost.

What a miracle Jerry McAuley was! One of the worst of men, yet he became by God's grace one of New York's greatest and most successful preachers. The life of Jesus Christ in the souls of men makes them live on the sky-line. When the life of Christ comes in, the sin and dirt go out with the honorable sinner and the "bum" alike.

Thank God for salvation! We have lots of religions in the world, but only one salvation. Paul said it was "great." Nothing today in all the world is greater. Go on, Brother Hallimond, with your "sky pilot" work. It will stand the test of time and eternity!

WHAT IS AN INTERNAL BATH?

By R. W. BEAL

MUCH has been said and volumes have been written describing at length the many kinds of baths civilized man has indulged in from time to time. Every possible resource of the human mind has been brought into play to fashion new methods of bathing, but, strange as it may seem, the most important as well as the most beneficial of all baths, the "Internal Bath," has been given little thought. The reason for this is probably due to the fact that few people seem to realize the tremendous part that internal bathing plays in the acquiring and maintaining of health.

If you were to ask a dozen people to define an internal bath you would have as many different definitions, and the probability is that not one of them would be correct. To avoid any misconception as to what constitutes an internal bath, let it be said that a hot water enema is no more an internal bath than a bill of fare is a dinner.

If it were possible and agreeable to take the great mass of thinking people to witness an average post-mortem the sights they would see and the things they would learn would prove of such lasting benefit and impress them so profoundly that further argument in favor of internal bathing would be unnecessary to convince them. Unfortunately, however, it is not possible to do this, profitable as such an experience would doubtless prove to be. There is, then, only one other way to get this information into their hands, and that is, by acquainting them with such knowledge as will enable them to appreciate the value of this long-sought-for health-producing necessity.

Few people realize what a very little thing is necessary sometimes to improve their physical condition. Also they have almost no conception of how a little carelessness, indifference or neglect can be the fundamental cause of the most virulent disease. For instance, that universal disorder from which almost all humanity is suffering, known as "constipation," "auto-intoxication," "auto-infection," and a multitude of other terms, is not only curable but preventable through the consistent practice of internal bathing.

How many people realize that normal functioning of the bowels and a clean intestinal tract make it impossible to become sick? "Man of to-day is only fifty per cent efficient." Reduced to simple English, this means that most men are trying to do a man's portion of work on half a man's power. This applies equally to women.

That it is impossible to continue to do this indefinitely must be apparent to all. Nature never intended the delicate human organism to be operated on a hundred per cent overload. A machine could not stand this and not break down, and the body certainly cannot do more than a machine. There is entirely too much unnecessary and avoidable sickness in the world.

How many people can you name, including yourself, who are physically vigorous, healthy and strong? The number is appallingly small.

It is not a complex matter to keep in condition, but it takes a little time, and in these strenuous days people have time to do everything else necessary for the attainment of happiness, but the most essential thing of all, that of giving their bodies their proper care.

Would you believe that five to ten minutes of time devoted to systematic internal bathing can make you healthy and maintain your physical efficiency indefinitely? Granting that such a simple procedure as this will do what is claimed for it, is it not worth while to learn more about that which will accomplish this end? Internal bathing will do this, and it will do it for people of all ages and in all conditions of health and disease.

People don't seem to realize, strange to say, how important it is to keep the body free from accumulated body-waste poisons. Their doing so would prevent the absorption into the blood of the poisonous excretions of the body, and health would be the inevitable result.

If you would keep your blood pure, your heart normal, your eyes clear, your complexion clean, your mind keen, your blood pressure normal, your nerves relaxed, and be able to enjoy the vigor of youth in your declining years, practice internal bathing and begin to-day.

Now, that your attention has been called to the importance of internal bathing, it may be that a number of questions will suggest themselves to your mind. You will probably want to know WHAT an internal bath is, WHY people should take them, and the WAY to take them. These and countless other questions are all answered in a booklet entitled "THE WHAT, THE WHY and THE WAY OF INTERNAL BATHING," written by Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, the inventor of the "J. B. L. Cascade," whose lifelong study and research along this line make him the preeminent authority on this subject. Not only has internal bathing saved and prolonged Dr. Tyrrell's own life, but the lives of a multitude of hopeless individuals have been equally spared and prolonged. No book has ever been written containing such a vast amount of practical information to the business man, the worker, and the housewife; all that is necessary to secure this book is to write to Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell at No. 134 West Sixty-fifth Street, New York City, and mention having read this article in The Christian Herald and same will be immediately mailed to you free of all cost or obligation.

Perhaps you realize now, more than ever, the truth of these statements, and if the reading of this article will result in a proper appreciation on your part of the value of internal bathing, it will have served its purpose. What you will want to do now is to avail yourself of the opportunity for learning more about the subject, and your writing for this book will give you that information. Do not put off doing this, but send for the book now, while the matter is fresh in your mind.

"Procrastination is the thief of time." A thief is one who steals something. Don't allow procrastination to cheat you out of your opportunity to get this valuable information, which is free for the asking. If you would be natural, be healthy. It is unnatural to be sick. Why be unnatural, when it is such a simple thing to be well? (Adv.)

On Getting Your Money's Worth

WE are sometimes led to wonder whether our people realize the great qua ty of material which appears in the Christian Herald every week anc he tremendous effort that is necessary to produce it. We believe it is a p pular conception that papers edit themselves, that people all over the world contr ute articles and that all the Editor has to do is to make a proper selection and hand em to the printer to be published.

As a matter of fact, however, the Editor of the Christian Herald, and of any her paper for that matter, is its inspiration. True, people from all over the world ontribute articles, many of them regularly, but not more than one in ten articl on any one subject can be used, and many of these so used must be rewritten to a ge extent. And yet all this is produced and delivered by mail to our readers for 50 a year, or less than three cents per issue.

We are making these comments apropos of our announcement that the pri of the paper would be raised in November from $1.50 to $2.00 a year, because c he increasing cost of paper, ink, binding, labor, etc., etc. Even so, the price will b ess than four cents per week. Examine this very issue which you are now reading nd tell us if you do not think it is worth very much more, not only at the present ice but at the price to come.

First, there is the opening story, which is number one of a series of articl by Ida M. Tarbell on Leading the Nation into Health, entitled "Sober First," a s ng presentation of the conflict between drink and efficiency. Then there is Dr. Fr cis E. Clark, head of the Christian Endeavor, who discusses in a most entertainin ay some of the great men of Japan, a country which he is visiting on his present rld tour. Incidentally, the picture on the Bible and Newspaper Page shows wl is practically the latest photograph of Dr. Clark. Dr. Clark has been many es around the world in his continuous endeavor to spread the work of the King m, and is a frequent contributor to the Christian Herald.

This week's sermon is by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, the famous auth of "In His Steps," whose sermon in the present instance is entitled "The Ame an Home." No man can treat this topic better than Dr. Sheldon. There is al an enlightening article on missionary work in Chile, and a news story about the est lighthouse in America, which landmark has just observed its two hundredth niversary. The special news page records many very important items, and the ory of the great European War brings that weekly narrative up to date. There a, of course, the Meditations, one for every day in the week, the Editorial Foru, a special article by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., accompanied by one of her poe s, a continuation of Frank G. Carpenter's informative articles on Alaska, and a de htful story out of the usual run for the Christian Herald entitled "The Vaga nd Sale." Of course the regular departments are there as usual.

All of these features and departments are in your hand, and by turning ov the pages one by one, and appreciating the time and trouble and inspiration that ere necessary to produce them, you will realize the tremendous quantity of ma rial which is published in the Christian Herald during the year. In short, compa 52 issues of the Christian Herald with what you will get in any monthly magazine r a year and see if the Christian Herald does not actually give you the most for our money.

Eight-Hour Law Stops Strike

THE eight-hour law was passed by Congress in record time as forecast in the Christian Herald last week, passing the House by a vote of 239 to 56 at a night session, September 1, and the Senate six o'clock, September 2, by a vote of 43 to 28. Following the vote in the Senate, leaders of the four brotherhoods, having been assured that the President would sign the bill promptly, sent telegrams to all of the district presidents canceling the strike order. The President signed the bill on Sunday morning, September 3, and to make sure that there could be no legal objection to this procedure, signed it again on Tuesday, September 5. The bill as it passed Congress provides that beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours shall be deemed the measure or standard of a day's work for the reckoning of compensation of all employees who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier and actually engaged in the operation of trains in interstate commerce. Railways not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railways, and interurban railways are excepted. The act provides also for the appointment of a commission of three to observe the operation and effects of the institution of the eight-hour day during a period of not less than six nor more than nine months, the commission to report within thirty days after the conclusion of its investigation. There is also a provision preventing the reduction of the pay below the present standard day's wage, pending the report of the commission, providing for payment in excess of time at a pro-rata rate. The passage of this act is hailed by organized labor as a clean-cut victory, the eight-hour day being the one sure foundation upon which all labor movements recent years have been based. Th ailways and employers generally d not show the same enthusiasm, banker nd manufacturers as well as many ra vay executives expressing the opinion t t a strike with all of its inconven ces would have been preferable to the tlement made. The expressions o the President and the action of Co ess have given stability to the dema for an eight-hour day, which causes en oyers operating longer hours to expec hat this settlement will be made the ba s of new demands on all sides. The rai ays claim that the bill is unconstitut nal, and in this some senators seeme inclined to agree. It is expected th an expression as to its constitutionalit will be obtained from the Supreme urt before the railways will accept th law and put it into full effect. The pr s of the country seems about evenly di ed, but not along political lines, in eir opinions. In some quarters it asserted that the country has been eld up, that Congress has been coerce nd that the nation's lawmakers have one the bidding of a small minority the people. Among others it is felt th the paramount rights of the public ave been disregarded, and much sym thy is shown for the railway executives the position that they took as the ass ed protectors of the public pocket. ere is no question that any increase ost of service will be, as usual, passed to the consumer with more or less inc se. Victor Berger, the one Socialist con ssman, declares the law is the first tep toward government ownership of nsportation facilities. The rest o the President's program was deferred ntil the next session of Congress.

Young People's Topics for October 1

How Money-Spending Reveals Character

Epworth League Topic. Luke 15 : 13; II Sam. : 1; I Kings 10 : 20; Mark 12 : 42-44

ABSALOM in his vanity spent his money for horses and chariots and heralds to announce his coming. Solomon ranged stone lions on either side of the approach to his throne, and the drinking-vessels of his house were gold, and his reign was the most magnificent the world had seen. Yet in his later days he wrote, "All is vanity." The prodigal son wasted his money in riotous living, and learned at his own cost the transitory nature of momentary pleasure. The widow dropped her last farthing into the treasury of the Lord, and she alone of these four Scriptural examples of spenders is commended in the Word.

Now, then, shall we spend our money? Shall we give it all to the Lord? Shall we spend nothing on ourselves? It would be foolish to make such an interpretation of the references given for this lesson. There are times for giving, when it is indeed worth while to give all, and to deny ourselves even necessities, in order that we may minister to the suffering of others. But it is wise to purchase the necessary things which make life comfortable without making it extravagant, and which enable us to live well without living lavishly. It is a safe rule to set aside one-tenth of our income for the treasury of the Lord. In the case of some incomes, the setting aside of a tenth represents real sacrifice. In the case of others, a tenth would not satisfy the generous heart. Our use of our money inevitably reveals our character. If we buy cheap jewelry instead of shoes, or furnish our homes luxuriously while our grocer's and butcher's bills are still unpaid, we shall judge ourselves unerringly, and the world will judge us with equal assurance. The buying of books may mark a literary taste unless we leave them unread. Unread books may be as great an extravagance as unnecessary jewels, and may mark only another kind of wastefulness. But if we buy good books and read them, if we buy good things and use them, if our automobiles run on deeds of kindness, and if the other things that we possess are used to do all the good that we can with them, our spending of money for them will be one mark of a noble character. If we give ostentatiously, and take pains that all the world should know when our money reaches the treasury and what is the amount thereof, we shall gain little of the credit that we seek. The quiet gift is the noble gift, for it is still true that he is most blessed whose left hand knows not what his right hand doeth.

The Consecration of School Life

(Consecration Meeting)

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic, Prov. 4 : 1-13

SOMETIMES we are inclined to think lightly of our school work, and to feel that our time is wasted. The world with its jobs and pay envelopes looks very alluring, especially if we are approaching sixteen and not quite satisfied with our high school course. The world is full of people sidetracked for lack of education, and there are also many who are realizing their lack and who have made it up by earnest work in hours that might have been used for pleasure or for rest. "Take fast hold of instruction; let her not go: keep her, for she is thy life," is good advice; it is Scriptural advice, and it is just as true in 1916 as it was in the day of Solomon. But there is also the other admonition: "With all thy getting, get understanding," for instruction without understanding is of little value. All who have found the Christ should consider the work in which they are as being done in his name and as being the thing that he wants them to do, until he leads them into something else. If it is his will that we should be in school, then let us consecrate all our time and energies upon that school life, in order that it may yield the fullest measure of individual development and of personal power for future living.

The student can be as much consecrated for his task as the minister or the missionary; and, after all, missionaries and ministers are only students who have gone on a little further. Therefore, at the beginning of this school year, let both those of us who teach and those who study make sure that in all of our work we glorify the Lord, whose we are, and whom we serve.

The Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.D.

I HAVE a little spare time in my ministry, but, although forty years of age, I find that this time is spent in general reading which leaves me with a sense of vagueness after all. I have no subject about which I can speak with a certain amount of authority. And yet it is most difficult to fix upon a subject to which I can devote my time. Would you please suggest some subject or subjects in Ethics or Literature to which I could give my spare time? G. M. J.

BOOKS are like friends: every man must find out his own—those that are congenial to him, those that suit his peculiar aptitudes and satisfy his peculiar needs. And therefore a prescribed course of reading is worse than useless. You regard it as a mere "by-work" for your "spare time," whereas in truth it is an essential office of the ministry. A minister is a Christian teacher, and a teacher must be adequately equipped. It has pleased God to enshrine his revelation in a book, or, to speak more truly, a literature, in Jerome's phrase the "Divine Library" of Holy Scripture; and the supreme office of the minister, that he may be indeed "a good steward of the manifold grace of God," is its study and interpretation, according to the apostle's injunction to Timothy (I Tim. 4 : 13, 15, R. V.): "Give heed to reading, to exhortation, to teaching. Be diligent in these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy progress may be manifest unto all." It is no doubt true, as an old minister once said, that "unsanctified learning has done much mischief to the church of God"; but unsanctified ignorance has done still more. It is sanctified learning that I am commending; and it is a precious gift which no one who truly reverences the Word will ever deny. It was never more needed than in our own generation, when knowledge is streaming in through so many opened windows and the minds of men are bewildered by the flood of light. Preachers are urgently needed who, by reverent and patient meditation, are able to interpret the eternal truth in terms of the new intellectual order and lead men into a larger and nobler heritage of faith and hope. Is it not a significant fact that the Reformation, the revival of religion and the Renaissance, the revival of learning, came hand in hand? Without Erasmus the humanist, Luther and Knox would have been impossible. The Reformers were justly designated "the men of the new learning"; and Luther spoke a truth which we have need to hear when he said in a letter to Hess: "I see that no noteworthy revelation of the Word of God has ever been made unless he has first prepared the way by the rise and flourishing of languages and literature as precursors, like the Baptist." The point, therefore, which I would enforce is that study is an essential office of the ministry. It is not merely an employment for spare hours; it is a daily duty, and no minister has discharged his day's duty unless he has devoted a solid portion of it to strenuous work among his books. Nor is any ministry truly fruitful unless it be educative, discovering to the hearers the significance of the Word and revealing to them its glory.

I constantly hear ministers alleging that they have no time for study; but the fact is that study saves time. It enriches the mind and makes preaching easy. If one studies the Word, if, like Bunyan, one is "never out of the Bible," he will never be at a loss for a sermon. Rich and gracious messages will crowd upon him, and his perplexity week by week will be which he should choose from the embarrassing profusion. A barren ministry means a dead church; and it is a neglected study that makes empty pews.

DAVID SMITH.

On the Job

NO matter what a man is, I wouldn't give twopence for him, whether he was the prime minister or a rick thatcher, if he didn't do well whatever he undertook to do.

—George Eliot.

THE little Western college had survived many a vicissitude during its history of forty years, but when a panic struck the country and money grew scarce and food expensive, the president of the small university felt as if its days were numbered. He began to curb even modest expenditures, taking more and more of the toil on his own shoulders. His careful little wife, who for years had been caring for house expenditures, also began to pare down, here, there and everywhere. Donations did not come in as they had been wont to do, and men to whom the president had turned confidently during past years confessed regretfully that until times grew better they could hardly meet their own business claims.

"For all I see," observed the college president one morning while he rose from the breakfast table, "I have to get into overalls."

"Why?" queried his wife.

"Something must be done to the buildings. They are shabby enough to shame us. We are as poor as the government was one year when it could not afford paint to smarten up the Executive Mansion, so they whitewashed it."

"Oh, John," cried his wife tearfully, "I have endured many a blow to our pride, but this is the last straw."

SHE watched him stride across the green campus with a pail of whitewash in each hand; then she returned to her work with her heart weighted down by despair. Her husband stood on a ladder swabbing whitewash over a wall which sun, rain and snow had weathered gray, when a voice from below cried, "Say, my man, where can I find the president of the college?" A man in automobile togs stood at the foot of the ladder.

"I think you can see him at his house at twelve. Will that suit you?"

"Yes, all right; I'll look around the place till noon."

Five minutes later a tall figure in overalls, carrying two empty whitewash pails, crossed the campus. The president was donning his black suit and the dignity which went with it, when his wife entered with a visiting card.

"John, it is Van Vlack," she began nervously, "that Boston man who sent you two thousand dollars a year ago. What shall we do? We ought to ask him to dinner. There is nothing but sausage and potatoes and apple sauce."

"Invite him," answered the husband coolly.

"To a dinner like that?" She wrung her hands. "Why, John, the man is a millionaire."

"We can't help it if he is; it's the best we've got."

THE college president glanced in dismay at the little gray-clad figure who waited for him. It was the man he had looked down upon over the edge of a whitewash pail. When dinner was over, Van Vlack asked to be taken over the college. Before he said good-by, he pulled out his checkbook.

"I came through here," he confessed, "to see how things were going for you in these hard times. I had imagined a thousand dollars might be welcome."

"It would be, sir, tremendously welcome."

"I suppose fifty thousand would be fifty times more welcome?" There was a keen twinkle in the eyes which glanced up at the big man by his side. "When a college has a president who is not ashamed or afraid to tackle the job I found you doing today and doing it so excellently, one cannot question the quality of the men it will produce. If you teach as well as you whitewash, I can use a hundred of your graduates right in my own business."

Which Way?

THE war has filled mankind with amazement, consternation, and hope. It is amazing that under e banner of the Prince of Peace ıristian Europe has gone to war.

It is ground for consternation that e fundamental principles of religion, affecting the conduct of nations, are ɔudiated by Christian empires. That od will has had little weight in international diplomacy has long been own and regretted; but to say that nsiderations of justice, of good faith, honest dealings, need have no influ- ce in the counsels of any nation has en left to modern theorists.

It is ground for hope that men perve the antagonism between the nciples of personal conduct and the nciples which are advocated as the biters of international conduct. These ı be readily set forth in the following ınner:

nciples of International Conduct	Principles of Personal Conduct
Might	Right
Force	Reason
Authority	Liberty
Deception	Truth
Nationalism	Brotherhood

OPPOSING SYMBOLS

Sword	Pen
Scepter	Ballot
Crown	Liberty's Cap
Mailed Fist	Clasped Hands
Military Cross	Red Cross

OPPOSING PRECEPTS

"War should be the only study of a prince."—Machiavelli.	"There never was a good war."—Franklin.
"A stormy joy when red swords meet."—Hemans.	"War is Hell."—Sherman.
"By blood and iron."—Bismarck.	"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."—Zechariah.
"By this sign, conquer!"—Constantine.	"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."—Jesus.

OPPOSITE RESULTS

Empire	Republic
Tyranny	Freedom
War	Peace
Death	Life

BETWEEN these opposing principles and these contrasted results the nations must now choose. In the eternal conflict of opinions there can be no neutrality. Although it may look today as though the advocates of Force and Nationalism were in the ascendant; although Christianity as an international arbiter may seem impotent; although Imperialism may seem triumphant, nevertheless, as surely as there is faith on earth and a God in heaven, the final victory must rest with the light of Reason, the magnetism of Fraternity, the flame of Liberty, and the Spirit of Christ.

Among the Workers

OME twenty years ago, at a religious convention, William Taylor, the first Methodist Bishop of Africa, called for volun- ɪs to carry the Gospel to the heathen tribes he Congo. A tall, fine-looking young man se, the first to respond. He was the Rev. nes C. Teter, and he was promptly acted. He went to the Congo, where, with young wife helping him, he founded stas, and did a wonderful work among the vangelized natives. After a time the dly African fever came, and the young missaries were both stricken down. They overed, and continued at their post of duty five years. Then both were sent home, inded and with bodies emaciated and enbled. Pastor Teter and his wife have a par- in Florida now, where they have conted a very promising Gospel work for the t twenty years or more. They are growing ; but though the African sun left its mark on them, their desire to win souls is as ng as ever. The veteran is now minister he Methodist Episcopal Church at Minne- and is also state prison chaplain. At neola he has built a commodious dwelling, own as "Saints' Rest," on a high and lthy elevation, hundreds of feet above seal and free from malaria. It is a home for down or invalid Christian workers. Pastor er, who is cordially endorsed by Governor k Trammell, Florida's executive, and other ling officials and citizens, is struggling to cure an equipment for the "Rest," and uld welcome the cooperation of any who may be interested in a work of this character. We shall be glad to forward any contributions which readers of the Christian Herald may send.

A CONFERENCE of Jewish mission workers and supporters was held recently in New York City to bring the pastors and membership of city churches into closer touch with the local Jewish missionary problem. Rev. S. B. Rohold, of the Jewish Mission, Toronto, presided. Resolutions were adopted calling for the appointment of a committee to consider the best methods of evangelizing the Jews of New York.

MARVEL HOUSE, Inc., founded by the Rev. C. E. B. Ward at Mountain View, near Montclair, N. J., is now reported out of debt. Since its establishment it has helped sixty young men and boys. Marvel House exists to furnish a Christian home to young men and boys between the ages of fifteen and twenty-five, to give them vocational counsel, and to help them decide upon a life work. A new Marvel cottage has recently been established in an apartment at 502 West One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Street in New York City. Board is furnished to the boys at cost, and the number admitted to a cottage is limited to twelve or fifteen.

A UNION evangelist campaign was opened in Oxford, Kan., August 27, under the leadership of Dr. E. S. Stucker of Ottawa, Kan.

Praying a School Through

T is interesting to watch the way in which God trains his leaders. Always there is a term of hardship, en of disappointment. A growing se of the importance of the study of Bible in the mother tongue, in the ining of men and women who exted to devote their lives to Christian vice, was borne in upon Dr. Wilbert White, president of the Bible Teach-' Training School, first, through the k of such training in his own college l seminary courses, and even in his t-graduate work. A trip to India in 08, during which visit Dr. White conted Bible conferences for missions, intensified this impression, as res of devoted servants of God came Dr. White, confessing that whatever y might have received of value in ining for their life-work, they had not l proper training in the English ble.

On October 29, 1900, in Montclair, w Jersey, the first meeting was held the interest of the proposed Bible chers' College. On that night a testant Episcopal clergyman ened as the first student of the college be, and $800 was subscribed toward year's expenses, which in that season exceeded $9,000. In 1902 the Bible Teachers' College moved to New York, being obliged, by that move, to change its name from Bible Teachers' College to Bible Teachers' Training School to comply to a ruling of the Regents of the University of the State of New York. The expenses of moving the entire school outfit was $5, and everything owned by them was placed in a one-horse express wagon.

In 1904 the imperative necessity of a building where students might live together and also have classrooms and library equipment was felt. There was a suitable building available, but funds were not in hand, not even in sight. A group of students and faculty met for prayer for financial aid. After praying for some time, a member of the group felt an impulse to sing the doxology, but refrained, as there seemed to be no reason for such an outburst. She had scarcely checked the impulse when a member of the faculty who was present felt the impulse and yielded to it. When Dr. White returned from a trip which he had taken, the little group told him of the matter, and learned, by comparing notes, that it was at that very hour that he had received the money for a

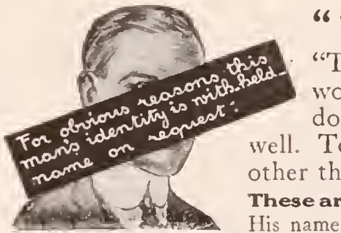
How I Jumped from $1500 to $50,000 Yearly



For obvious reasons this man's identity is with-held—name on request.

"'Power of Will' Was My Guide"

"Three years ago I was making $1500 a year and working day and night. Today I make a thousand dollars a week and have time for other things as well. To the lessons in 'Power of Will' more than any other thing do I owe this sudden rise."

These are the exact words of an owner of "Power of Will." His name is not published for obvious reasons, but will be gladly given in confidence on request to anyone ordering "Power of Will." As remarkable as is his experience it might almost be called typical of what this wonderful course in Will Training is doing for thousands of men and women in every walk of life who are using "Power of Will" as the stepping stone to greater accomplishment.

What is "Will-Power"?

The Will is the motive power of the brain. Without a highly trained inflexible will, a man has about as much chance of obtaining success in life as a railway engine has of crossing the continent without steam. The biggest ideas have no value without Will Power to "put them over." Yet the Will, hitherto entirely neglected, can be trained into wonderful power like the brain or memory and by the very same method, by intelligent exercise and use.

If you held your arm in a sling for two years it would become powerless to lift a feather, from lack of use. The same is true of the will—it becomes useless from lack of practice. Because we don't use our wills—because we continually bow to circumstance, we become unable to assert ourselves. What our wills need is practice.

"Power of Will"

by FRANK CHANNING HADDOCK, Ph.D., a scientist whose name ranks with such leaders of thought as James, Bergson and Royce, is the first thorough course in Will Power ever conceived. It is the result of over 20 years of research and study. Yet you will find every page in the 28 lessons written so simply that anyone can understand them and put the principles, methods and rules into practice at once with noticeable results right from the very start.

Meant for You

There are over 100,000 people in all walks of life who own "Power of Will." Among them are such master men as Judge Ben B. Lindsey; Supreme Court Justice Parker; Wu Ting Fang, ex-U. S. Chinese Ambassador; Lieut.-Gov. McKelvie of Nebraska; Assistant Postmaster-General Britt; General Manager Christeson of Wells-Fargo Express Company; E. St. Elmo Lewis, former Vice-Pres. Art Metal Construction Company; Gov. Ferris of Michigan, and many others of equal prominence.

Never in the history of self-help literature has there been such a record. And the owners regard it as a veritable text-book. It has been instrumental in changing the entire lives of thousands—making them dominant personalities, self-confident and eager in place of the fearful, unhappy, unsuccessful men and women they formerly were. No matter what your position—whether an errand boy or the president of a mighty corporation—no matter what your age, from 17 to 70, Power of Will can change your whole life—can make a new man of you just as it has for so many others. Whatever you want in life is yours, be it money, power, prestige or happiness, if you but master the wonderful system of will training taught in "Power of Will."

"The Happy Medium"

You can pay too much for a car—or too little. A car can be too heavy—or too light. It can be too big or too small—too high powered or too low.

There is a "happy medium" if a car is to fulfill the real requirements for which automobiles exist. Namely: as vehicles for pleasure driving and to serve the utilitarian purpose of rapid, convenient, low cost transportation.

The Allen, in fullest measure, fills this logical position. It is "The Happy Medium."

The Allen is roomy and comfortable—has plenty of power for its weight—costs little to run and maintain

There is another red letter day in the school calendar. It is the date of the birth of the Establishment Movement, October 29, 1909.

The prayer-spirit in which the school was born has characterized its growth from the beginning, and on this night the students and faculty met together for prayer for its further development. Dr. White said on that occasion that if a million dollars were available the school might be established. Someone suggested that perhaps 1,000 people could be persuaded to assume responsibility for $1,000 each. The idea was immediately taken up by the students and faculty, and later a pledge drawn up saying that the signer promised "to pray and work for $1,000 toward the establishment of the school." Two hundred and seventeen students and faculty members belong to the Purpose Pledge Group and already nearly one-third of the $217,000 pledged by them has been paid to the treasurer.

An outgrowth of the Establishment Movement is a daily prayer meeting known as the Establishment Pr er Meeting. Attendance upon this m eting has always been voluntary, but he room is nearly always filled. In addi n to prayer for the "establishment of he school and for the establishmen of every member of it," there is def te prayer each day for a few of the udents, the names being taken in al abetical order. A half dozen per ps will be remembered definitely each y, and also the work to which they ve gone. Letters come to the school al st daily expressing thanks for this coo ration, and in many instances telling w on the very day on which special pr er was made for a particular person d work that person and the work rece ed some special manifestation of G l's presence and power.

Another step forward was made ssible recently by the ruling obtained m the Board of Regents of the Unive ty of the State of New York grantin an amendment to the charter of the sc ol. by virtue of which graduates of he Bible Teachers' Training School ho shall qualify may receive degrees o he University.

Record Records of Sunday School Attendance

WHEN we published, on June 14, the Sunday school record of eighteen years' unbroken attendance by Mr. J. Crawford Jolly of Warren, Ark., the Christian Herald had not yet learned of a contest, ending last Easter Sunday, conducted by the St. Louis Republic, as a result of an offer of prizes for record attendance by Rev. J. W. McKean, superintendent of the American Sunday School Union at Carthage, Mo. This contest was open to all Missourians and the prize for Sunday school attendants over twenty years of age was won by Mr. William McClung Paxton of Platte City, Mo., who had not missed attending Sunday school for sixty-four years. The premium for Sunday school members under twenty years was taken by Roy Nelson of St. Louis, nineteen years old, who had not missed a Sunday in fifteen years. Few could hope to match Mr. Paxton's record, for he lived to be ninety-four years to complete it and at last reports was still adding to it. John W. Mounce of Hannibal had attended Sunday school for sixty-one years with only twenty-five absences. Edward R. Werry of St. Louis had not missed a session for twenty-three years, and had not been tardy for eighteen. Judge B. W. Wheeler of the Lincoln County Court had on his desk a Bible given to him in 1867 as a reward for punctual attendance. He had been secreta of his Sunday school for twenty-t ee years, and said he had begun to g to Sunday school perforce, and had isliked it at first because there were oo many girls, but he had gradually st this antipathy.

There were other interesting rec ls, forty-four years, thirty-three years nd thirty-one years; and one youngst of thirteen had a record of ten years.

Several worthy contestants have en called to our attention since June 4. Arthur E. Cole of Hamilton, Ont., as an unbroken record of twenty-one y rs, and Miss Clara Myers of the ne Sunday school one of twenty y rs. John Stooss of Lemoyne, Pa., b an going to Sunday school in German at the age of fifteen, and has not miss a Sunday since. His record is now y-six years, but he is still young, ly seventy-one. H. H. Weaver of M nt Vernon, Texas, has been superinten nt of a Baptist Sunday school for f y-seven years, with only three abse es. He is seventy-nine years old. r. Herbert Post of Kansas City, Mo. as been in Sunday school for eighty ur years, starting at five, and his tal absences could not equal the numb of sessions in a year. He says, "If ne wants to keep young, spend you ife in Sunday school. Mingling with y ng people keeps you young."

fragments, where the charmed circle can never again be perfect, because this sense of mutual comradeship has vanished. The fire is out on the altar. The ashes are gray on the hearth, the bird is dead in its cage, the love-song is choked with selfish sobs, because each member of the home has gone his own way and regarded the family as an organization for self and not for mutual service.

I BELIEVE, in spite of the vast hotels and built-by-the-mile flats in our cities, that the American home is the greatest institution we have in this country. The vast majority of all the people I know and meet are married, have children and live in comfortable homes. Most of the 100,000,000 inhabitants of the United States have not yet applied for divorce, and very few are in jail. When I walk down town from any direction in my own home town, I walk past miles of homes, and I believe the great majority of the people in them are fairly happy and useful. The unhappiest people I know are the homeless ones. The great hope for America lies in the fact that nothing has yet been discovered which can take the place of a home. As long as this Republic lasts, it will be safe to say no institution can be invented to surpass the home for joy and usefulness, for falling healthfully in love, for getting married, for working to support a family and helping to train it up in ways of honesty, truthfulness nd purity. This is old-fashioned enou to satisfy the human race, and as ne as the light of the sun every mor g. Therefore we will continue to put ur faith in the eternal value of the fa y, and cheerfully defy the pessimis to destroy an institution founded by od and blessed by Jesus Christ in his st public miracle.

IT is at first sight a pathetic f re which we picture in the perso of Jesus when, after the day's teac ng and miracle-working and the co st with his enemies in the big city, he es out to the village of Bethany, to he home of Lazarus, Martha and M y; but when we look at it again, we fi it one of the most beautiful pictures i all history. He found refuge for his ed body and mind in the little home le at Bethany. The American home ay well have for its vision, to hang o he wall, the picture of the Master in he simple little house, with its vine-co ed porch, visiting with the friends he l ed and passing the evening with the in quiet and affectionate friendship.

God give America simple Chri an homes, and its future will be guarant d! Nothing in all the world can take he place of the home. If we are going be great, we must first of all be good, nd the center of the Republic's great ss and goodness will always be foun at the heart of "home, sweet home."

Christian Herald Evangelism

On different occasions the Christian Herald, with the cooperation of its readers, has taken an active part in evangelistic work involving the use of commodious road wagons, railroad "chapel cars" and portable tents. This year it has again been led into this very useful line of spiritual effort. Arrangements have been made with the well-known evangelist, Benjamin F. Butts, for tent work beginning in Michigan this month. Evangelist Butts, who has conducted spiritual work in many states successfully, will open at Grand Rapids, in a tent eighty feet by sixty feet in size, oblong in form and with a height of eight feet at the side walls and twenty-four feet in the center. This tent, which the Christian Herald in behalf of its readers has purchased and donated to the work, is of the army type, made of ten-ounce United States army duck in a most durable manner, and includes all necessary ropes, stakes and poles. It will accommodate an audience of 800, and will have a good-sized platform. Reports of the progress of the tour will appear from time to time in our columns.

Our readers are cordially invited to have a share in this enterprise, and contributions for that purpose will be welcomed. Gifts sent to the Christian Herald will be applied toward the cost of the evangelistic outfit. We feel that there are many of our friends who would be glad to have a personal share in this effort. The Christian Herald Evangelistic Tent will doubtless have a wide range of activities in the course of the coming months. Evangelist Butts is a singer and composer of considerable note, as well as an effective preacher of the Gospel. We ask the prayers of our readers that he may be made the means of bringing the message to many souls.

A California Suffrage View

"Suffrage" brings to my mind the suggestion of power in the hands of women, not only to right their own wrongs, but to help to make the world better generally. The present situation I regard as critical, owing to its peculiarity. If all the women would unite as a party, or join forces with the two parties that have always stood for woman suffrage, they would undoubtedly win the "amendment" we so much desire; but we have women of every political view, like the men, and most of them are undoubtedly influenced by their men folks, and vote against their own interests unwittingly. We are nearly five millions strong, and control ninety-one electoral votes, and it seems a pity that such a force should be scattered.

I agree that the situation is not a "forlorn hope." It can never be that. It is sure to come, as it is right and just. But some of us who have worked hard and long these many years do not want to wait another forty years to win, as we did for the few states we now have; and I doubt if we could win the Southern states in that length of time, if it must be done state by state.

I think most of us have some particular wrong we want to see righted, while interested in reform generally. In my own case, it is the destruction of the liquor traffic. I think that lies nearer my heart than anything else, because it not only affects those now living, and is a tremendous expense to the nation, but its worst effects are on the unborn children. My eyes were opened to that fact when serving as a director for the California Civic League. I had no conception of what a race of subnormal people were coming into the world, largely caused by alcohol which the parents drank, so our doctors and experts tell us. The California Civic League is an outgrowth of the College Equal Suffrage League, which did valiant work during the campaign. It is devoted to study and social service, and is a great educator.

The very word "Suffrage" opens the floodgates of my mind, and I long to be on the firing line again, till every woman in this country shall vote.

Satisfied Policyholders the One Supreme Test

In all business institutions there are certain tests that can be applied to determine whether these institutions have within them the elements of success.

In the great business of life insurance the one test that best tells the story is the attitude of policyholders toward their company; and this friendly attitude of policyholders is one of the striking features of the success of the

Postal Life Insurance Company

FIRST: Postal policyholders are of the thoughtful, discriminating kind; before arranging a Policy they look over the insurance field carefully for themselves. They want sound insurance protection at low net cost: they find it in the Postal Life and they do not have to be persuaded by an agent either. Incidentally, his commissions do not come out of their premiums—the first year or any other.

SECOND: When Postal policyholders once join the Company, they stick. Result: A lower percentage of lapses than in other companies.

THIRD: When Postal policyholders want additional insurance they take it out in the Postal—their Company—and advise their friends to do the same. All alike enjoy the benefits of these three features: Safety, Service, Saving.

First: Standard Policy reserves. Resources over $9,000,000. Insurance in force $40,000,000.

Second: Old-line legal reserve insurance not fraternal or assessment.

Third: Standard policy provisions, approved by the New York State Insurance Department.

Fourth: Operates under strict New York State requirements and subject to the United States Postal Authorities.

Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau arranges one free medical examination each year if desired.

them. The greater portion of the inhabitants of the Dobrudja are by race and sympathy Bulgarians, and it will be interesting to see therefore what attitude this population will adopt toward the present invaders. On this attitude to some extent will depend the rapidity of the success of this movement, and if this back-door attack develops into a rapid success it may have the effect of compelling the Rumanians to recall their troops from the northern front to repel this invasion from the south.

On the northern border of Greece the situation is practically without change, where the French and English are endeavoring to advance up the Vardar River valley. To both the west and east of the battle line proper, however, important developments have occurred, which probably will have a considerable influence on the entire campaign on this frontier. To the west the Italians in Avlona, Albania, who are cut off by an Austrian and Bulgarian wedge projecting south from the left wing of the Allied battle line south of the Greek frontier, and who have recently been heavily reinforced, are making strenuous efforts to cut through this wedge and join up their line with the main line. In pursuance of this object they have attacked the Austrian position east of Avlona, and captured a few villages in the immediate outskirts of Avlona, but their progress, up to the present time, has been small.

To the east of Salonica, to the east of the end of the Allies' right wing, the Bulgarians have considerably improved and strengthened their positions, and now completely outflank that right wing. How important the occupation of this outflanking position by the Bulgars is may be judged from the following extract from the current number of the Army and Navy Journal, the semi-official organ of our army and navy, and hence our best technical authority on military matters:

"Many months ago, when the defeated Allies retreated south of the Greek frontier and established their base at Salonica, we expressed the opinion that their right flank along the Struma would prove a dangerous element in any further effort to retrace their steps towards Serbia. It is now quite evident that no progress can be undertaken through the Vardar River valley north of Doiran without the cooperation of powerful flanking forces able to defeat the Teutonic flanking operations from the Struma."

The future development of this campaign therefore depends on whether or not the Allies will be able to get outflanking forces into position, the first step in which operation will of necessity be the driving of the Bulgarians and the Turks, who are in support of the Bulgarians, to the rear of their line from their present positions on a line running northerly from Kavala.

The British casualties on all fronts during the month of August are stated by London to have amounted to about 128,000, which is a great drop from the month before.

Thirteen Zeppelins raided the eastern portion of Great Britain the night of September 2 and 3, three of which succeeded in penetrating either to or near London. This is the largest fleet so far engaged in a raid. The British anti-aircraft defenses succeeded in destroying one of the invaders. The British also report that only some eleven casualties, very little material damage, and no military damage resulted from this raid.

Only comparatively minor activities by the submarines were reported last week. There has been a movement started in Great Britain to compel Germany, in the event that the Allies win the war, as a condition of peace to give the Allies a ship for each ship sunk by her or her allies' submarines, before German merchant ships shall be permitted to sail the ocean.

A new German government loan of two billion dollars was announced during the week.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

An unusual number of letters have been received this week addressed to the Prayer League, and the petitions which the writers ask the League to lay before the Throne of Grace are exceedingly varied.

A Heartbroken Wife and Mother writes from Oakland, Ore., asking continuance in prayer that her erring husband may soon repent and become a Christian and return to his family. She closes with these words: "Pray without ceasing that God will soon bring the prodigal home."

"Husband," Salem, N. J., asks prayers for healing of family differences and the return of an absent one who has left the sorrowing household.

"An Elderly Woman," Jackson, Miss., in weakness and about to undergo an operation, asks for the prayers of the League to give her strength and courage for the coming ordeal.

C. G., Columbia, Mo., writes: "I wish to tell you of the good your prayers, with mine, have done for me. It is growing easy to be cheerful and patient. It is coming over me every day that I am in God's school, being educated. My grandchild is well in answer to your prayers. There is one thing I am very ur as been removed by prayer: when I feel and can not have things so, then I say: 'But they are praying for me, and God hears.' I have a joy now that you must share, for it is in answer to prayer."

Mrs. E. G. B., Vancouver, Wash., asks the prayers of the League that her husband and self may be delivered from a great burden now pressing upon them and be able to save their home.

Rev. Walter B. Williams, superintendent of the Nanah Kroo Mission, Liberia, West Central Africa, makes a special request for prayer in behalf of the war refugees, men, women and children, who are now being housed at the mission. It is a spiritual crisis and a great revival is needed among them.

Mrs. G. W. S., Upper Sandusky, Ohio, asks prayers for healing from illness if it be God's will, and if not, that he may be able to say "Thy will be done." "A Mother" in Weiser, Ida., gratefully acknowledges that the prayers of the League have been answered in behalf of a son addicted to the strong drink; she requests prayers in behalf of another son, also a victim of the drink habit, for whom she is pleading with God night and day.

Mrs. G. L., Pennsylvania, asks prayers for the recovery of a relative, mentally afflicted, and of one who is a victim of dropsy, and that the writer herself may be restored to health and brought to acceptance and assurance of divine forgiveness.

"A Mother," Washington, D. C., writes: "I want to ask the prayers of the League for my three sons and their families. While I am proud of my boys, my great desire is that they may have a closer vision of Christ; and also prayers for one who is at this present time in Siberia, that he may be brought home to his family and his mother in safety."

Among the acknowledgments of answers to prayer are these: Mrs. J. E. W. writes from Blakeslee, Pa.: "I wish to acknowledge with thanks the release of my husband from the drink habit." E. M. M. writes: "I was a complete nervous wreck as a result of too close application to study, and my physician said I was in danger of becoming an invalid for life. I prayed earnestly to God for guidance, and he showed me the means by which I have been completely restored to my former state of health and usefulness in the world." L. A. B. writes: "One year ago last fall I sent a request to the Prayer League for my daughter, who was very low, and I thank the Lord she is well and strong again." C. A. K. writes: "Many thanks for answered prayer." S. B. B. writes: "God be praised! He answered a prayer that was wonderful indeed. When I asked the League to pray that my father be saved from the drink habit, he was." C. E. F. writes: "Some time ago I wrote asking the League to pray for my restoration to health. I thank my Lord that I am very much better." L. V. H. writes from Oberlin, Ohio: "I want to acknowledge the answer to our request for prayer for some news of my brother, who had left home. We heard from him a few months after our request. He is doing fine." L. M. I. writes: "Several weeks ago the doctor told me that I would have to undergo a very serious operation. I felt God would help me, and I wrote asking prayers that God would help me. He has wonderfully answered; my trouble stopped, and I am growing in strength every day." A. W. writes: "I am glad to acknowledge the healing of my husband through the prayers of the Christian Herald Prayer League."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from:

L. M. A., Moline, Ill.; M. L. S., Lackawaxen, Pa.; Mr. B., Knoxville, Tenn.; Mrs. A. E. P., Sanford, Fla.; A Friend, Sunfield, Mich.; Mrs. M. F. B., Mount Pleasant, Mich.; Miss E. M., Flat Top, Colo.; E. L. K., Colden, N. Y.; Mrs. H. A. D., Colorado Springs, Colo.; M. A. C., Pittsburg, Pa.; Mrs. G. H., Warrensburg, Ill.; Mrs. A. M., Home, Pa.; Mrs. J. G. M., Booneville, Miss.; Mrs. J. L., Philadelphia, Pa.; M. E. H., Fremont, Neb.; Mrs. S. N. L., Owatonna, Minn.; Mrs. M. E. C., Waxahachie, Texas; Mrs. M., Rowland, N. C.; Mrs. W. H. L., Sapulpa, Okla.; E. E. S., Berlin, Mass.; E. E. H., Waucoma, Iowa; A Constant Reader, Cumberland, Md.; A Friend, Milwaukee, Wis.; S. B., Burruss, Va.; Mrs. O., Tyrone, Pa.; I. E. H., Peoria, Ill.; J. W., Chatham Run, Pa.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Lakewood, Ohio; Lancaster, Ky.; Anderson, S. C.; McCool, Ind.; Tobaccoville, N. C.; Kroo Mission, Africa; Burruss, Va.; Versailles, Ill.; Tyrone, Pa. (in the Presbyterian and Lutheran churches); Ransons, Va. (for a great outpouring of God's Spirit in a revival in church that many may be saved, including three dear ones); Jonesville, N. C. (pray for the success of a meeting to be held here); San Jose, Calif. (pray for God's blessing on the Bierderwolf campaign here beginning September 10); Pocahontas, Tenn. (that the power of God may weigh heavily on the hearts and minds of his people during two revivals here); Berkeley, Calif. (that every member may be sanctified and all the unsaved converted during revival in the Pilgrim Advent Church of Oakland, Calif.).

Eight parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; Mrs. M. M. T. asks prayer that mind may be strengthened, and mother's mind restored; Mrs. F. L., J. M. J., Mrs. A. T. J., Mrs. M. A. E., ask prayer that their brothers' minds may be restored. Eleven friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives or friends.

Six friends ask prayer that their sight may be strengthened. Miss M., Mrs. F. L., Mrs. J. L., ask prayer that their mothers' sight may be restored; Mrs. T. E. asks prayer that sister's eye may be healed of cancerous tumor. Eleven other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends or relatives.

Thirty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Seven parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; two wives, their husbands; L. A. W. asks prayer that father and brother of a dear girl may be cured of the liquor habit, and their home made happy.

Sixteen, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Mrs. J. E. W. asks prayer that brother-in-law may be delivered from the drug habit.

R. S. S. and Mrs. B. V. D. ask prayer that their four sons may be saved; thirty-one other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; nineteen wives, their husbands; fifty for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Eighteen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others.

One hundred and twenty-six ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including A. E., that mother may be restored to health without an operation; another, Mrs. J. M. G., that a niece may be restored to health and care for six little ones; eighty-five friends, for healing for themselves, including Mrs. A. B., "that I may be cured of a long standing ailment." Twenty friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Forty friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

One hundred and fourteen friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

ADOLPH TRCIDLER

THAT greatest dandy of all times, Beau Brummel, set great value on the smoothness of his face. After shaving, his custom was to go over his face with a pair of nippers. Hairs that survived the razor were pulled out by the roots.

Brummel was famous for his grooming at a time when good grooming was the exception and defects were covered with patches and paint.

Today in any gathering of business men you will see the freshness of face and ruddiness of skin that is due to the tonic effect of a daily Gillette shave.

Just lather briskly, rub in well: use the Gillette with an angle stroke: dip the face in cool water and pat dry with a soft towel.

The Gillette shave is velvet-smooth, no matter how wiry the beard or tender the skin. A keen, fresh blade is always ready. Prices $5 to $50. Blades 50c. and $1 the packet. Dealers everywhere.

EUGENE CHRISTIAN

New Stomachs for Old

By Arthur True Buswell, M.D.

THOUSANDS of people who suffered for years with all sorts of stomach trouble are walking around to-day with entirely remade stomachs. They enjoy their meals and never have a thought of indigestion, constipation or any of the serious illnesses with which they formerly suffered and which are directly traceable to the stomach.

And these surprising results have been produced not by drugs or medicines of any kind, not by foregoing substantial foods, not by eating specially prepared or patented foods of any kind, but by eating the foods we like best correctly combined.

These facts were forcibly brought to my mind by Eugene Christian, the eminent Food Scientist who has successfully treated over 23,000 people with foods alone!

In a recent talk with Eugene Christian, he told me of some of his experiences in the treatment of various ailments through food—just a few instances out of the more than 23,000 cases he has on record.

One case which interested me greatly was that of a young business man whose efficiency had been practically wrecked through stomach acidity, fermentation and constipation, resulting in physical sluggishness which was naturally reflected in his ability to use his mind. He was twenty pounds underweight when he first went to see Christian and was so nervous he couldn't sleep. Stomach and intestinal gases were so severe that they caused irregular heart action and often fits of great mental depression. As Christian describes it, he was not 50 per cent. efficient either mentally or physically. Yet in a few days, by following Christian's suggestions as to food, his constipation had completely gone, although he had formerly been in the habit of taking large daily doses of a strong cathartic. In five weeks every abnormal symptom had disappeared—his weight having increased 6 lbs. In addition to this, he acquired a store of physical and mental energy so great in comparison with his former self as to almost belie the fact that it was the same man.

Another instance of what proper food combinations can do was that of a man one hundred pounds overweight whose only other discomfort was rheumatism. This man's greatest pleasure in life was eating. Though convinced of the necessity, he hesitated for months to go under treatment, believing he would be deprived of the pleasures of the table. He finally, however, decided to try it out. Not only did he begin losing weight at once, quickly regaining his normal figure, all signs of rheumatism disappearing, but he found the new diet far more delicious to the taste and afforded a much keener quality of enjoyment than his old method of eating and wrote Christian a letter to that effect.

But perhaps the most interesting case that Christian told me of was that of a multi-millionaire—a man 70 years old, who had been traveling with his doctor for several years in a search for health. He was extremely emaciated, had chronic constipation, lumbago and rheumatism. For over twenty years he had suffered with stomach and intestinal trouble which in reality was superaciduous secretions in the stomach. The first menus given him were designed to remove the causes of acidity, which was accomplished in about thirty days. And after this was done he seemed to undergo a complete rejuvenation. His eyesight, hearing, taste and all of his mental faculties became keener and more alert. He had had no organic trouble—but he was starving to death from malnutrition and decomposition—all caused by the wrong selection and combination of foods. After a few months' treatment this man was as well and strong as he had ever been in his life.

These instances of the efficacy of right eating I have simply chosen at random from perhaps a dozen Eugene Christian told me of, every one of which was fully as interesting and they applied to as many different ailments. Surely this man Christian is doing a great work.

There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a little course of lessons which tells you exactly what to eat for health, strength and efficiency. This course is published by The Corrective Eating Society of New York.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon and dinner, curative, as well as corrective, covering every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist because every possible point is so thoroughly covered that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will produce the increased physical and mental energy you are seeking the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal.

If you would like to examine these 24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating, simply write The Corrective Eating Society, Department 349, 460 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely ask them to send the lessons on five days' trial with the understanding that you will either return them within that time or remit $3.00, the small fee asked.

Please clip out and mail the following form instead of writing a letter, as this is a copy of the blank adopted by the Society and will be honored at once.

CORRECTIVE EATING SOCIETY, Dept. 349, 460 Fourth Ave., New York City

You may send me prepaid a copy of Corrective Eating in 24 Lessons. I will either remail them to you within five days or send you $3.

Purified by Fire

WE present below a brief statement by Rev. H. K. Anet, one of the leading evangelical workers in France, on the spiritual awakening which is coming to the peoples of Europe through the trial of war. Christians who have made sacrifices in order to relieve the bodily sufferings of homeless women and children in the war areas have this assurance to more than compensate them for their gifts, that Christian generosity in this terrible time of need is regarded by the recipients as an answer to their prayers for aid. By every gift we must believe that God is answering the sobbing cries that go up to him without ceasing from the wrecked homes of Europe. In the confidence that we are coworkers with God in this world-emergency, let us who have been in any measure blessed with worldly prosperity share with these who have been deprived of everything. Let us not be weary in this well doing. The need continues as great as ever, indeed increases with every day's continuance of the war, and there is no limit to the Divine power to magnify our gifts and cause them to bear wonderful fruitage in redeemed lives.

The Souls of France and Belgium

By Rev. H. K. Anet, B.D., LL.D.

THE souls of nations are being purified by the fire of trials. In Belgium, a newly born patriotism has taken the place of the spirit of political partisanship which used to spoil everything in the national life. The threat of home-rule agitation among Flemings and Walloons has vanished before the common dangers and grievances. The Fatherland has been revealed, loved in proportion to the sacrifices suffered for its sake. In France, the jingoism of the "nationalistes" and tho anti-patriotism of the "internationalistes" have melted away, with all political and religious antagonisms, into the "union sacrée," which blends together all parties and all creeds in an admirable unity.

These transformations of our nations have a deep religious and moral meaning. We can put stress on these ethical reforms, because they were not the sudden fruit of the war, they are deeply rooted in the past process of regeneration. This great national issue has taught our nation the beauty of self-sacrifice, the joy of service, the little relative value of life and wealth, the tremendous prize of truth and righteousness. They are thus prepared to look up to the Source of all righteousness and the Author of every truth.

Fear-stricken, bereaved, oppressed and spoiled of their wealth, our fellow citizens in the territories occupied by the Germans are enriched spiritually. A Belgian lady refugee in London, converted there at some evangelistic meetings, told me: "I have lost everything; my house is burnt down, my belongings have been taken away; I am here alone in exile, and I don't regret all these losses, for I have found here a greater treasure, the Gospel of Jesus Christ."

Everywhere in the war zone, our pastors and evangelists are at the post of danger and of duty; they are preaching the Gospel to crowds eager for consolation for the sad past, and strength for the gloomy present, and hope for the peaceful future. In the Belgian churches, the first twelve months of the war have been a record year for the inscriptions of new members.

We see great opportunities for the evangelistic work now; but we can not carry it on alone. Our members are suffering under an appalling and increasing misery. Their faith, their patience, and their liberality are admirable. I could sum up their spirit of devotion to the kingdom of God in these words of a poor old woman insisting to make her pastor receive a few cents for the church fund: "Do accept my gift. I am glad to give something to the Lord this week, for next month I don't know if I shall have anything left to give."

We must also interest our American brethren in the reconstruction of our nations. Not one of us is doubting the B&B Adhesive Plaster.

Get the B&B products, because they are made to keep on hand, and because they are double-sure.

B&B Cotton and Gauze are twice sterilized, once after being sealed. They are made under hospital conditions to meet hospital requirements.

They are packed in protective packages. B&B Arro Cotton is packed in germ-proof envelopes. So is B&B Handy-Fold Gauze. None is unsealed till you use it.

B&B Cotton also comes in Handy Packages. You cut off only what you want, leaving the rest untouched. These protections may be vital to you sometime.

B&B Adhesive Plaster is made for surgery, but it has a thousand uses. It is rubber coated, and it sticks to anything dry. Any article made of any substance can be mended with it. Hot water bottles, lawn hose, tool handles, etc. Applied to flesh it doesn't irritate. Rolls of many lengths—10 cents up.

B&B Formaldehyde Fumigators are made twice the usual strength. This makes them double sure. Simply light the wick and close the doors. Use after any contagious disease, or before occupying any strange house.

Be as careful as your doctor. In these important things insist on B&B standards.

Merry Moments

When the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

WHO GOT THE BEST OF THE BARGAIN? A drummer tells an amusing account of a trade he witnessed in a small Indiana town. A man with a wagon load of brooms was dickering with the proprietor of the grocery store, who was anxious to buy his entire stock and pay half in cash and half in merchandise out of the store. The broom man wanted the money. At last the grocer offered half in cash and half in goods at cost. With some reluctance the broom-maker closed the trade. There were twenty dozen brooms at twenty cents a broom, in all forty-eight dollars. The man was paid his twenty-four dollars in cash, and the brooms were all unloaded and stacked up in the grocer's big front window.

"Now," said the grocer, with a wave of his hand, "just make your own selection from anything in my store at cost, twenty-four dollars' worth."

The man stood first on one foot, then on the other, and thought. Then he said: "Wal, I believe I'll jist take twenty-four dollars' worth of brooms at cost."

A MATTER OF DUTY. Professor: Young gentlemen, it is my duty and privilege to create in you a thirst for knowledge.

Student: Now, you have helped me to solve a problem over which I have been puzzling for some time.

Professor: Indeed, I am pleased to have been of assistance. May I ask in what particular I have enlightened you?

Student: I never could understand before why all your lectures are so dry.

HE WAS THE WHOLE OF IT. Over the wire to the parsonage came this request:

"The bishop would like to meet at the church this evening the pastor, the class-leader, the Sunday school superintendent, the presidents of the Cradle Roll and of the young people's societies, the president of the Missionary Society, the chorister and the sexton."

"All right. I'll be there," was the answer.

ELEVEN TO ONE. A young couple entered a preacher's study just as he was ready to begin morning worship in the church and requested him to marry them. In order not to delay the regular services, he asked them to wait until the conclusion of the sermon, when he would marry them publicly. When the sermon was finished he announced: "Now, will those persons wishing to be married please come forward?" Eleven women and one man promptly answered the call.—Blue Rapids (Kan.) Times.

From Ceylon—The Island of "The Spicy Breezes"

THE Christian Herald has often contained reports of the work of Arthur S. Paynter, the founder of the India Christian Mission, who has spent thirty-two years in India and Ceylon, and has recently returned after a brief visit to this country.

Mr. Paynter declares that Charles G. Finney spoke truly when he said that, whilst educational and industrial methods were of undoubted use on the mission field, he did not believe the heathen would be won to Christ in large numbers except by great religious awakenings—repetitions of Pentecost. Mr. Paynter has seen this verified over and over again. As a result of one long midnight preaching service when the Holy Spirit was graciously outpoured, fifty-three heathen converts, all belonging to one village, were baptized.

Only a half of the Great Commission, "Go ye," has been obeyed when the missionary reaches his field and preaches the everlasting Gospel. The second and more difficult part is the "teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Spurgeon said, "The power room of a church is the prayer meeting." Mr. Paynter tells of a prayer meeting in one of his villages in India at six in the morning at which 180 Christians were present. Are there many churches in this country could beat that?

The India Christian Mission has some 3,000 heathen converts in its South Indian district, and perhaps the best proof of the genuineness of the converts is the fact that the heathen people all around are calling for Christian pastors. Never a week passes but a delegation waits upon the missionaries (or a petition is received) from a heathen village begging that a pastor may be sent to them. The changed lives of the Christians is telling. The heathen are literally clamoring for the Gospel.

The present urgent need of the mission is the establishment of small Bible training schools where educated native men and women can be instructed in Bible truths and practical soul-winning

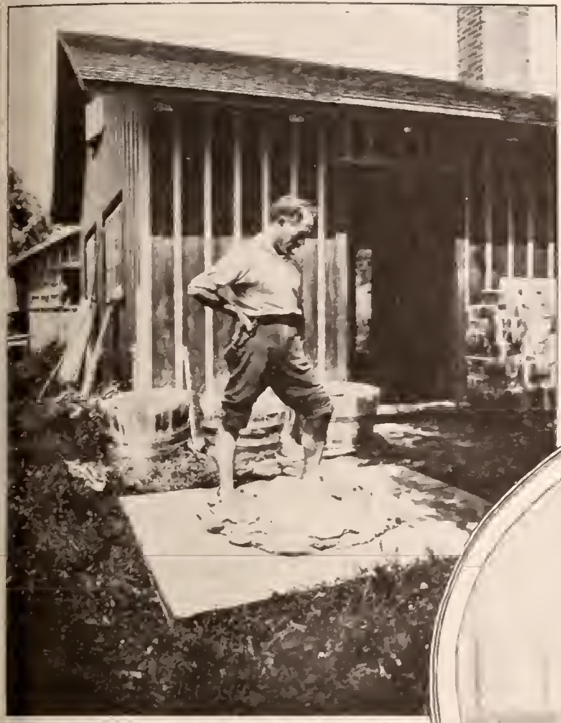
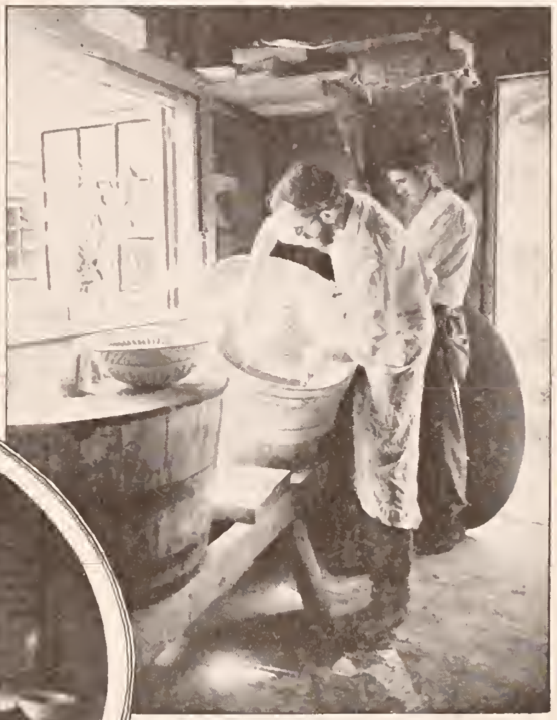
The Pottery Industry of Bedford Village, N. Y.

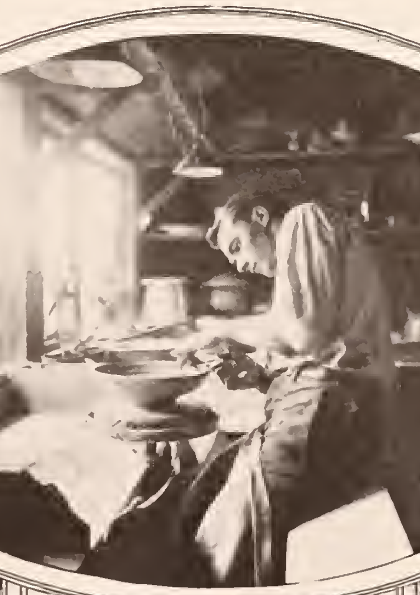
A quaint little pottery town nestled in a quiet valley where ancient methods and modern mechanism unite to fashion today such shapes as the Pharaohs used.



At the left. Mixing machines might work this clay, but the bare feet of this human machine will do it better. No bit of rock nor any coarse grain of sand can be left in the mud or the work will be imperfect.

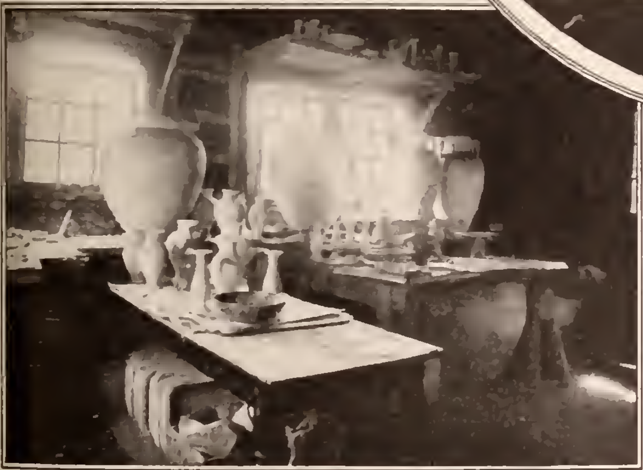
At the right. The glazing must be carefully done. The larger pieces are dipped, the solution is poured over the smaller ones, but only the potter knows what the solution is



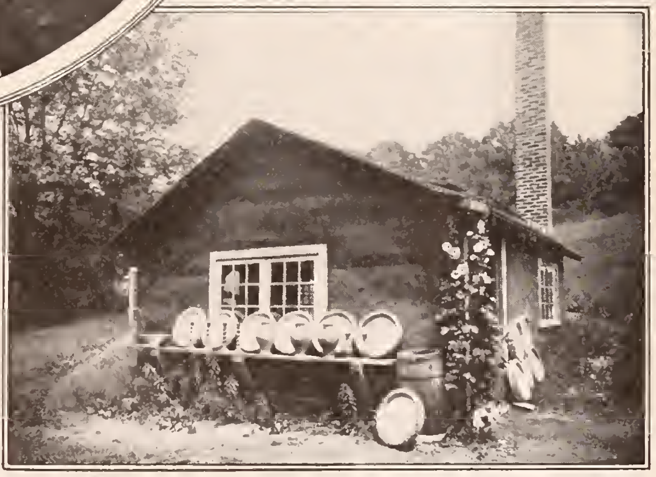


This workman shapes the clay upon the wheel and "throws" it into fairy forms. Artist he must be, with the eye of an Angelo and the touch of an Ole Bull The difference between pottery and just eathenware is in his soul.

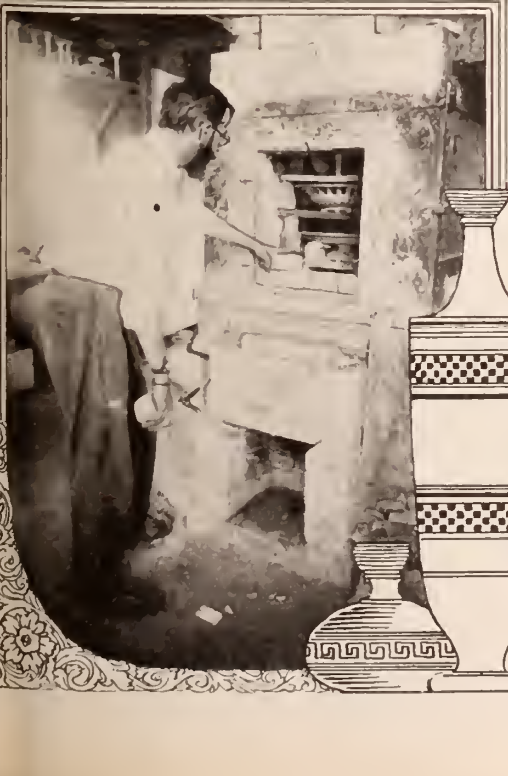
Below. Vases large and small in a corner of the pottery.

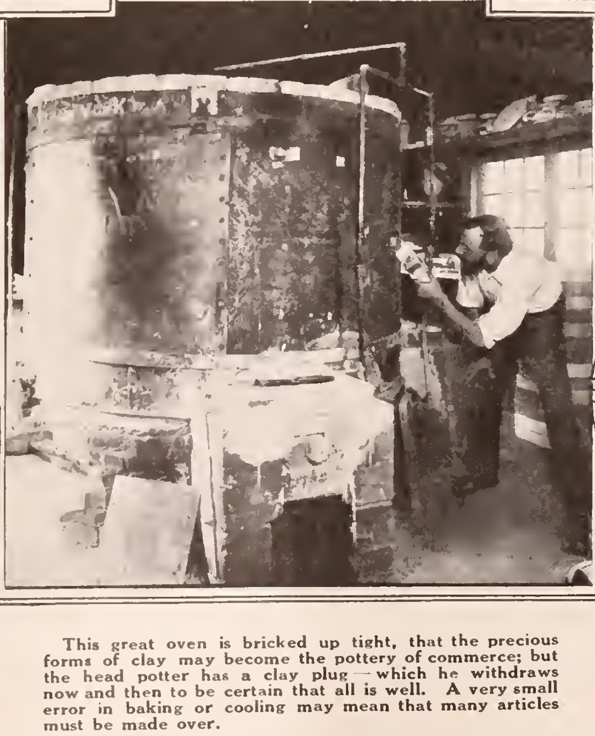


Below. The sun works, too, and dries well the potters' handicraft.



Below. When the gas oven is heated just right the ware is bricked up inside.





This great oven is bricked up tight, that the precious forms of clay may become the pottery of commerce; but the head potter has a clay plug — which he withdraws now and then to be certain that all is well. A very small error in baking or cooling may mean that many articles must be made over.

Below. The retoucher makes certain that no flaw remains.

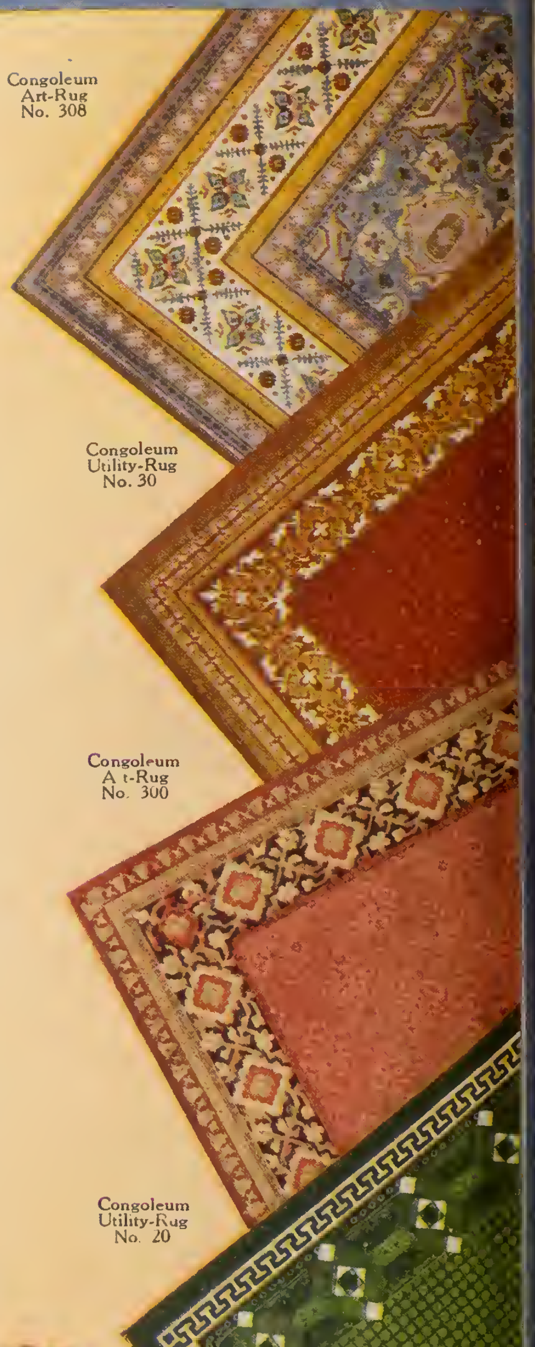
CONGOLEUM RUGS

The Ideal Combination of Beauty and Economy

Most women like Congoleum Rugs because they are low in price, convenient, easy-to-clean and sanitary. They are made in two grades—Art-Rugs and Utility-Rugs. Both grades have important features distinct from ordinary rugs.



Congoleum Art-Rug No. 308
Congoleum Utility-Rug No. 30
Congoleum Art-Rug No. 300
Congoleum Utility-Rug No. 20

Congoleum Art-Rugs

This is the higher grade—a little more carefully made and the product of famous rug designers. Congoleum Art-Rugs are made in one piece and the beauty of coloring and design has made them unusually popular. And yet the price is so low that any home can possess them. But Congoleum Art-Rugs are more than pretty and economical. They have qualities that are absolutely unique in low-priced rugs.

Washable and Sanitary

They are washable and sanitary. To clean them you simply mop them. No dusty, unsanitary beating.

Lie Flat Without Fastening

They lie perfectly flat without fastening which minimizes accidents due to tripping. They can't curl up or "kick up" at the edges.

Congoleum Art-Rug Sizes and Prices

9 feet x 10½ feet, $10.00 each   9 feet x 12 feet, $11.00 each

Congoleum Utility-Rugs

Our regular line of Congoleum Utility-Rugs contains numerous designs and sizes from which to make a choice. The variety of simple and elaborate patterns gives one the opportunity to suitably furnish every room in the house where a low-priced rug is required. Like Congoleum Art-Rugs, they are waterproof, washable, sanitary and lie flat without fastening.

Extraordinarily Low Prices

People can hardly believe that the wonderfully low prices are true. But they are. Think of getting a splendid Congoleum Utility-Rug, 9 x 12 ft., suitable for a big room, for $8.00—or a little one, 1 yard square, for 65c. Here are the sizes and prices.

3 x 3 feet	$ .65	4½ x 4½ feet	$1.50	6 x 9 feet	$3.90
3 x 4½ feet	.98	4½ x 6 feet	1.95	Two-piece Rugs 9 x 12 feet	$8.00
3 x 6 feet	1.30	6 x 6 feet	2.60	10½ x 12 feet	9.00

All prices quoted are higher in the far West and Canada.

Congoleum Rug Borders

A wonderful, decorative effect can be had by putting Congoleum Rug Borders or "Rug Surrounds", as some people call them, around the borders of a room, with a large rug in the centre. Congoleum Rug Borders cannot be told from hardwood floors because they have every grain and mark of real quartered oak. They are much more satisfactory than painting or staining. Make old floors look like new. Washable, sanitary and rot-proof. You should see them. Made in rolls, 36 and 24 inches wide at 50c. and 40c. a yard respectively. Your dealer will sell you just the length required. Special Rug Border booklet free upon request.

Congoleum By-The-Yard

Don't forget the many different patterns of Congoleum By-the-Yard. There is no better floor covering at the price. Waterproof, washable and sanitary. Lies flat without fastening and is rot-proof. Dealers sell it by the yard in rolls 72 inches wide.

Be Sure the Name Congoleum is on Back

Like every other commercial success, Congoleum has been widely imitated. To avoid inferior substitutes, be sure the name Congoleum is on the back of every Rug, Rug Border or By-the-Yard piece you buy. It is your protection.

Congoleum Rugs are manufactured in accordance with United States and Foreign Patents, with numerous other patents pending both in the United States and Foreign Countries.

Questions and Answers

D. D. D., Geneva, Fla. Please explain (1) Matt. 24 : 34. "Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled"; and also (2) Mark 4 : 12, "That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing, they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them."

1. Many of the prophecies have a twofold perspective and are subject therefore to a twofold interpretation. The passage in Matt. 24 : 34 is one of this class. This chain of prophecies began in the preceding chapter, with the prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, and passed in chapter 24 to the signs and portents which were to precede the second coming. "According to a usual way of speaking," explains a leading commentator, "this is accepted as meaning that the generation then existing would not pass away without seeing the beginning or first stages of the fulfilment of these predictions. Either the whole was fulfilled in the destruction accomplished by Titus, as many think (i. e., the whole of the first prediction), or, if we extend its scope, as some hold should be done, to the fact of the complete dispersion of the Jews by Adrian, every requirement of our Lord's words seems to be met, part being actually fulfilled and part then in process of fulfilment." The chapter draws an analogy between the fate of Jerusalem and the day of final judgment and redemption. and it is evident that verse 34 applies to the former alone, a conclusion which verse 36 justifies. 2. The passage in Mark 4 : 12 (see parallel in Matt. 13 : 13-15) is interpreted as meaning that those who voluntarily and persistently refuse to do what they know to be a spiritual duty become after a time morally incapable of doing it. In the passage in question, Jesus enunciated this law (quoting from Isaiah 6 : 9-10), under the operation of which their senses were judicially sealed up, as the result of their wilful rejection of light and truth in favor of darkness and obduracy.

A. M. R., Washington, Pa. Luke, from all the information available, does not appear to have been a born Jew, but his intimate acquaintance with Hebrew customs seems to show that he was an early convert to the Jewish faith. Eusebius calls him a native of Antioch, while writers in Origen's time identify him with Lucius of Cyrene, a kinsman of Paul. The time of his conversion to Christianity is uncertain, but it is probable that it occurred while Paul was preaching at Troas, where Luke was practicing his profession as a young physician. The claim of exclusive Jewish authorship for the books of the Bible has been disputed by many authorities. Some have held that Job was an Arab; others an Israelite; and still others have ascribed the book to Moses. Luke was probably the sole exception.

A. E. P., Idaho. The "religion" you describe is no religion at all, but merely a fad, which appeals to those who seek to be entertained and flattered by a philosophy that gratifies their sense of self-importance. A preacher who does not believe in the divinity of Christ, and who openly discredits God's Word, is assuredly not a Christian and is out of place in a Christian pulpit. It is possible, however, that you may have misunderstood him. Why not talk with him personally, before taking any step to sever your church connection?

W. H. H., Plymouth, Ind. You are quite right to decide to make restitution. See Matt. 5 : 26; Luke 16 : 10-12; Luke 19 : 8, 9; Rom. 13 : 8; Philemon 18. If the matter is one which relates to the Federal government, write the Treasury Department, Washington, D. C., stating in your letter that it is for the "Conscience Fund." If for the state government, send to the treasurer of your state. If for any corporation or individual, send direct, anonymously if you prefer. If it is a matter which, owing to the lapse of years, or the death of the creditor and the lack of information concerning his heirs, cannot be adjusted, you can still do your conscientious duty by devoting the full equivalent of your debt to some worthy cause—the poor, the homeless or unfortunate, the mission field, or some other benevolent or spiritual object.

C. E. E., Stephenson, Va., to make clear the belief of the Hicksite Friends (which is not generally understood), writes. "To correct wrong impressions, will you kindly insert this brief paragraph from 'Principles, Advices and Rules of Discipline' of the Baltimore Yearly meeting of Friends: 'Acknowledging as we do our dependence upon God as the great Head of the church, and accepting as the foundation principle of our faith the immediate revelation of his Divine Spirit; believing also in the divinity of Christ and in the great value of the truths contained in the Scriptures, these should ever be regarded with reverence.' If Wilbur's life of Elias Hicks is true, he certainly believed in the miraculous conception of Jesus."

G. O. H., Fayette, Idaho. The sin of intemperance is most expressly condemned in the New Testament. See Rom. 13 : 13; I Thess. 5 : 7, 8. The Old Testament gives various prohibitions and penalties attaching to immoderate drinking. Ps. 107 : 27; Isa. 5 : 11; 24 : 20; 49 : 26; 51 : 17-22; Prov. 20 : 1; 23 : 31-32; Hab. 2 : 15-16; Deut. 29 : 19. Temperance is referred to as a divine command. Phil. 4 : 5; Luke 21 : 34; Rom. 14 : 21.

In a recent issue we published in the Mail-Bag a letter from A. H. D., California, dealing with the question "How the children should spend Sunday." Mrs. L. B. C., Georgetown, Mass., commenting on this letter, relates an instance in her own experience. In 1905 she boarded some poor children—five boys; none of them brothers. The Congregational minister, the Rev. C. C. Carpenter, visited L. B. C.'s home and was very much impressed with the way in which the children spent Sunday "playing church." He wrote this description: "A boy eleven years of age, with four other boys younger than himself, all living in a home where they received the first care and love their young lives had known, were 'playing church,' and he was conducting services as he had heard them in the church since he came to his new home. He took for his text 'I have a Father in the promised land. When my Father calls me, I must go.' The little ones sat in perfect silence as he explained his text in this way: 'My friends, "I have a Father," means that God is our Father. "In the promised land" means in heaven, for you know Jesus is in heaven and sees all you are doing now. Now won't you sit a little stiller? "When He calls, I must go" means that some day Jesus will tell us we cannot live here any longer, but we shall die. "To meet Him in the promised land" means we shall see Jesus up in heaven if you are all good—but mind one thing I will now say, and that is, you never will have another mamma like what you have now and you must mind all she says.' Then he offered an appropriate prayer. I asked them about their meeting. One in the center was the minister. One at the left said he was the 'music lady,' one at the right the 'bell-ringer' and the two other little fellows in the front row modestly said, 'We listen.' One was 'money-collector.' This way of spending Sabbath afternoon was their own idea and they practiced it for a long time every week." Perhaps this may give an idea to some other readers which will prove a helpful change in the present methods of spending the Sabbath in quiet country homes where children abound.

H. L., Staunton, Va. The case of the three candidates who were admitted to the ministry is understood to have been settled more agreeably than was anticipated. The newspaper versions were exaggerated.

G. B. W., Bethany, Neb. If I have wronged any one in word or action, and have written asking his forgiveness, and up to date he has not acknowledged the receipt of same, do you think I have exonerated myself in the sight of God?

If in your heart you have freely forgiven and have tendered the olive branch of reconciliation, you have done all that is required of you. It would be well to treat the episode as past, and when you meet, to be cordial and friendly. There are many who are shy about coming forward in such a case, but will be cordial enough when opportunity offers.

L. V. E., Newbern, N. C. What does David mean in the Nineteenth Psalm, when he says, "And I shall be innocent from the great transgression." A friend and myself were discussing this question, and wondered what great sin this might be.

David, as verse 13 of the Psalm shows, was speaking of sins of presumption. Deliberate sin is the sin we plan, knowing it to be wickedness. "Such sins," writes one commentator, "are tyrants, striving to enslave God's servants." "The great transgression" may be regarded as the climax of the "presumptuous sins" to which we cling, although knowing that by so doing we are in peril of entirely falling away from God. Continued indulgence in presumptuous sins is the forerunner of such a crisis as the verse clearly indicates. The ingredients that make sin presumptuous are knowledge, obstinacy, deliberation, deafness to conscience, opposition to what we know to be the divine will, and repeated commission of the same sin. Among the presumptuous sins are theft, drunkenness, profanity, sensual indulgence, Sabbath-breaking, lying, false witness, and others, which are presumptuous because they are committed in the face of knowledge, in defiance of a known law, and repeatedly.

There is a new angle of spiritual experience in this letter, which comes to us from a prisoner in a state penitentiary. He writes: "Here one sees mankind in the unmaking. There are many salvable lives here, which, though having only struck the outer reef sin, being smothered, twisted and po ded, the waves of environment, into usel wre There are many human machines l e. ne ing only a little of the lubricant love their truth-and-honesty gearing to ke th perfectly good men; yet they are dem to the scrap-heap to rust away. Do u kn I believe every one should occasi lly l himself in a room, absolutely al , fo period of three or four days and g over own character. Constant Reader, Montana. Plea expl the difference between Matt. :5 Acts 1 : 18.

The account given of the death o udas Acts 1 : 18 differs slightly from tthe story of the event. In Acts we d th Judas bought a field with the mone paid his betrayal of his Master. Matt w gi the exact account of the transactio hen tells us the field was purchased by e pri with the money Judas earned. T by means contradicts the statement n A where Judas, by a common figure spee is said himself to have bought the f l wh his money purchased. The mann of traitor's death is explained by the y pr able suggestion that Judas hung hi elf fr the branch of a tree on the edge of a recip overhanging the valley of Hinnom; d th the rope breaking, he fell to the eart nd dashed to pieces.

E. W., Chicago. What is the m ning II Tim. 2 : 15?

The apostle is here telling his pu of things to do and to avoid in his inist Among others he tells him to sho hims a workman that need not be ashame that one "rightly dividing"—the litera neani is "cutting straight." This admits f ma figurative applications, such as, for stan to the work of the sculptor, the plo an, carpenter, all of whom must be able htly divide in order to do effective w s. B we may also class this among th medi words with which these epistles ab d, a see in it the work of the surgeon, in ich a deflection from the true line of incis mig be perilous or even fatal. Mrs. McD., Celina, Texas. Who re t two witnesses mentioned in Re 11, a what was their mission or test ony?

There have been many opinions to t identity of the two witnesses. S e ha held that the reference was to hist al pe sons, such as Moses and Aaron. J ua a Caleb, Elijah and Elisha. By su an i terpretation the number two is u erstoo with a literalness inconsistent with e sym bolism of numbers in the Book of R latio If we take literally the number of wi sses, will be difficult to show why we s ld n give a literal interpretation to their p phecie their miracles, their ascension int heav in the presence of their enemies. T bett interpretation is to see in the witn ses b lievers who, in any age or land fulfi he id of witnessing—those who amid al he d fections of others remain faithful the Lord.

BEFORE THE STORM

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE day was dark and windy, and the storm was sweeping free
Across the lonely country, and the skyline seemed to be
A mass of molten thunder in the hollow of a sea.

We rode across the country, and the horses seemed to fly,
For they felt the lurking danger in the clouds that hung on high,
And they trembled as the lightning ripped the curtain of the sky.

Came a peal of belching cannon from that cloud without a form.
The air grew breathless, lifeless, for the wind was sullen, warm;
And, praying in the heavy dark, we fled before the storm.

For a Sober Nation

ontinuing the First Article in a Series by IDA M. TARBELL on "Leading a Nation into Health"

I the public and the workingmen as a body would back up the employer if he refused to hire a man hat drank, the problem would be simplified; but here is only one industry in which, so far, this is do, and that is railroading. Among the general ru in the Standard Code of the American Railway Asciation is the following:

> e use of intoxicants by employees while on duty is prohibited. Their use, or the frequenting of places where they are sol is sufficient cause for dismissal.

he rules contained in the Standard Code have been ad ted by a great many of the railroads of this countr. It is probable that the public would support the raoad in enforcing the rules to the letter. Whether h ourts and unions would is uncertain, though they ha already put themselves on record as supporting diissal for intoxication. In 1913 a passenger conuctor was dismissed for intoxication while on du by the St. Louis Southwester Railway. The order to which wh this man belonged took up hi ase and secured a strike vote. Bore the strike was enforced, however, such conclusive evidence th the man had been drunk was pbefore certain members of the uns interested that a committe of them challenged the vote, a obtained a court injunction. T case finally went before the Feral Board of Mediation, and w settled by the unions withdr ing their demand that the diissed conductor be reinstalled. T point of interest here is that, as e judge who granted the injution said, "It is conceded on bo sides that if the conductor w intoxicated as charged, he was pperly discharged."

s things now are, the employer omanager who has set out to me "sober first" the rule of his sh will have no such backing as t railroads find. His first attack a his most fundamental one shld be on conditions. But he kws well enough that it will be a ng day before good conditions ale will control, or even make a ery sweeping change in, the dking habits of many groups of wkingmen. They have the hit as a class. The extent to wh this is true both statistics a observation show. The ten stes in the country having the laest number of men in manufauring pursuits in 1910 were t ten states (with two exceptis) having the largest number of open saloons. tand at the close of the working day near the exits o actories in open towns, and watch the men fill to exding the saloons. Go to the mining towns where soons are forbidden. In every yard, in the alleys, on in the little hallways, you will find conspicuous, i he litter which makes them horrible to see, piles o empty beer bottles, kegs and crates. They are l-overs of the weekly spree at home.

still more vivid exhibit of the support the workinan gives whisky and beer is the fringe of saloons a "joints" on the outskirts of "dry" or regulated iustrial towns. One of the scandals of Gary, Indna, that marvelous newmde city, has been the "atch," a wedge of land running into Gary, but not owned b the town, and so not subj to its liquor restrictions. The Patch became a street of sh lawlessness and hateful order as possibly did not for ame exist east of the Mississpi, though today its worst piod is in a fair way of being done in the hasty powder a munition settlements wich war and greed are throwing together in or near so many great industrial centers. With war go all the vices.

WHAT is to be done for and with these tens of thousands who drink because they have always done so, and upon whom no change of conditions makes an impression? Our modern employer is a tireless experimenter. He thrives on problems human as well as mechanical. He is ready to try anything. He is becoming one of the best patrons of drink cures that there is in the country, and though he is by no means always rewarded, the percentage of success justifies trying it in many cases. Procter & Gamble of Cincinnati have for years sent men on whom no persuasion had had effect to a cure, and with encouraging results. One man was sent three times before the appetite finally yielded. He has been sober so long now that they consider him cured. Not many employers in the country would show the same patience.

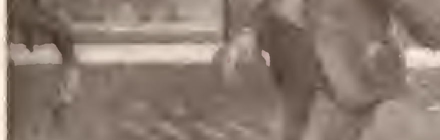
The man who has set out to make "sober first" the rule of his shop uses the drink cure, and he by no means despises Billy Sunday. He knows that men often have so lost self-control and self-respect that nothing will avail but a rough jar, a liberal pounding of head and heart such as Sunday gives. The result of his work, particularly in the steel and iron towns of western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio, corroborate his judgment.

A universal safety device

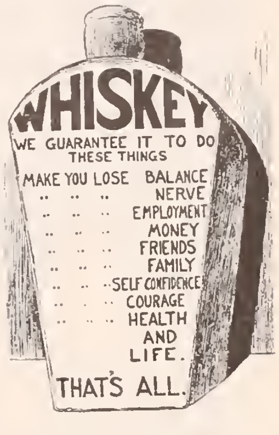


A specimen of shop placard

SUNDAY'S famous sermon on "booze" has again and again brought audiences of thousands of men to their feet as in an almost unanimous judgment that they and the world would be happier on a water basis. "Come up here, kids!" Sunday cries out. "Come on, let them see you!" A dozen or more boys walk out sheepish and awkward to the front of the stage. "Men, you see before you the raw material of the saloon," Sunday cries out. "There isn't a drunkard in the world, or one who has gone to his grave in hell through liquor, who one day was not exactly like these boys. Look at them, innocent, clean, pure, with every prospect in life! They are what whisky preys upon!"

Who could be so hardened that he would resist this plea? It has swept the saloons clear of hundreds upon hundreds of patrons. How permanent have the results been? I put this question to an officer of one of the greatest plants near Pittsburg, one truly desirous of seeing the traffic in liquor suppressed.

Whiskey Keeps Its Promises



A "Chicago American" cartoon popular with booze fighters

> "As far as lessening the number of saloons in either Pittsburg or Allegheny County," he answered, "I do not believe it has made a particle of difference. I do believe, however, that in individual cases there has been a great deal of lasting good done; for instance, I know of two puddlers who work for our company who were drunk nearly every night of their lives, and, after coming under the influence of Mr. Sunday, neither of them has had a drink since. I believe there has been considerable good done in this way. Sunday was in our town six weeks about three or four years ago, and I believe the good effects of his work are still felt in that community."

This answer averages well with a score I have received from fair-minded men in positions to know the aftermath of Billy Sunday's exertions.

Quite as direct, though less pungent and emotional, are the appeals of the safety bulletins and factory organs which many corporations and firms now support. The liveliest amateur editing I know is done in these little periodicals. The fixing of drink as a large factor in accidents has turned all the safety sheets into temperance advocates. Satire and ridicule are their chief weapons. There are few men who can get away from a lesson like the "Booze Fighting" placard shown here, which is now going the rounds of the bulletins.

You can count, too, on these factory bulletins making excellent use of every item of news that makes a temperance argument. Such paragraphs as the following go the rounds of the greatest factories in the country:

> A recent dispatch from Kansas City states that Kansas has purchased, in the past year, $37,000,000 worth of motor cars, and that some bankers are apprehensive as to whether this continued drain on the resources of the state may not, eventually, be very much felt. A Wichita president is not troubled, however.
> "If you will compare our bank deposits for each year," he says, "you will note a steady increase in them, so we are not loaning money to buy automobiles, neither is there any decided decrease in the banks of the state, either national or state. We are buying our automobiles and paying for them, and I do not believe anybody need have grave apprehensions as to the result upon our general finances.
> "There is another side to this problem that I am wondering if the general public has figured on. Reliable statistics show that a sister state spends $24 per capita for liquor per year, and that Kansas spends $1.50 per capita for liquor of 1,700,000. If I figure it correctly, this gives Kansas something over $38,000,000 to spend each year, which the sister state does not have.
> "The money spent for liquor fills orphans' homes, puts widows over the washtubs, keeps insane asylums running overtime and does a fair job of filling up the pauper end of the cemeteries. The Kansas man who buys an automobile loads his family into the car, takes them out into the open air, prolongs his own life and gives his wife and children something of what is theirs by right.
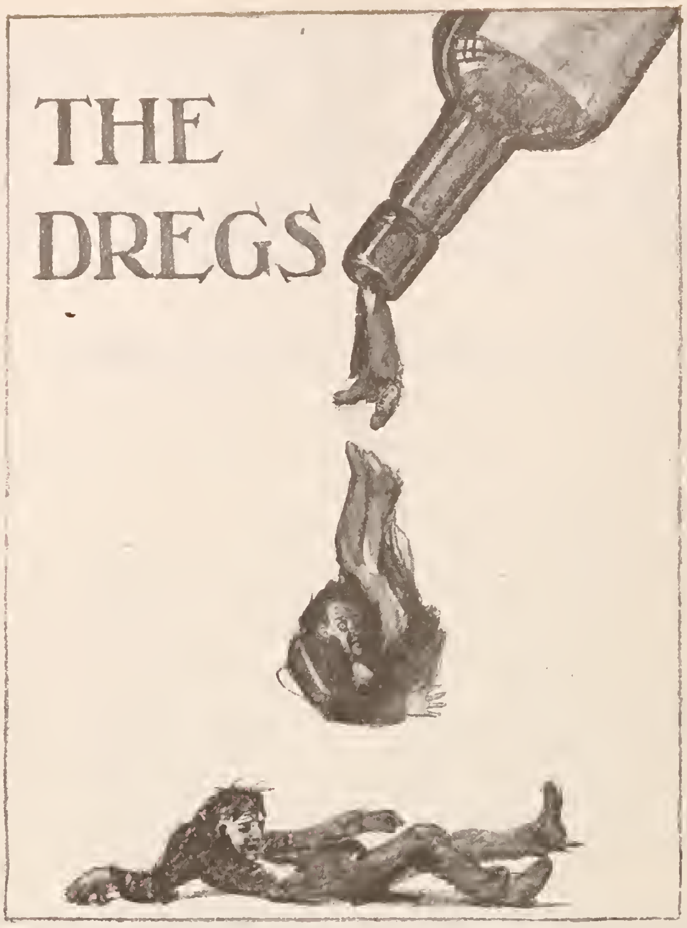
> "I think our financiers need not worry about our automobiles until they have solved the problem of the awful waste of the liquor traffic."

NONE of these efforts cover the entire field. There are always good workingmen that conditions do not touch. There are men who will not take a cure, and can hear Billy Sunday unmoved. Their cases go deeper, and to reach them some of the finest kind of individual work is done. Not done simply in small shops of a few hundred employees, but in big ones of several thousands. There are no fixed methods. The head of the service bureau of one big concern, a man who meets problems with fine intelligence and sympathy, declares that it is as difficult to say how he would handle an incorrigible case as it would be for a doctor to diagnose a case without seeing the patient. He studies his man, finds the point at which he thinks he can be touched, and then prepares for his attack. He tells of one man who he was unable to touch until he discovered he was extremely sensitive to ridicule. On two succeeding sprees he told an impossible story as to the cause of his absence, and by spreading the story among the other foremen and his fellow workmen, they made life miserable for him with unmerciful kidding. This was ten or twelve years ago, and he has never been drunk since.

At the Ford plant in Detroit, where at this writing some 20,000 men are employed, there is an untiring effort to secure sobriety. There is no attempt to bring men to signing the pledge so far as I know, no interference with the regular glass of beer. It's "getting drunk" which prevents the "big envelope" (the $5 a day) going to a man, or takes it away. There are numberless cases of men picked out of the gutter, put through a "cure," and now on the straight road. They will go to any length in their war on the liquor habit. Mr. Lee, the head of the sociological department, says emphatically, "We'll do anything." He tells of one case where a man who had boldly made himself drunk in the presence of an investigator was carried bodily to a cure. Today, so far as one can tell, he is forever done with liquor. "Eating out of his wife's hand," he was described to me! The loyalty of that wifé to Ford's is eternal.

The man once cured has, too, nothing but gratitude. One of the most wonderful temperance lectures I ever heard was from a man of thirty who had been brought into line through the determined efforts of a Ford investigator. He was a clean, fresh boy, still solemn with the wonders of his redemption. "Lady," he said, "if when I was a boy somebody had talked to me as these people have, if there had been anybody to be interested in me like they are, I'd have money enough laid up to live without working. I'm a good workman, always was when I was sober, but generally I was in the gutter. I wasn't happy! No drinking man is. When I went home nothing looked right to me. I didn't like the way my supper tasted, and I didn't like my wife's looks. I was breaking down, too. I hadn't a friend. Talk about the saloon-keeper being a man's friend. He is when you have money to spend; can't do enough for you. Pats you on the back, cashes your orders, lets you sit and read, do anything so long as you drink; but when you stop, he stops. I met a saloon-keeper today that I have paid lot money to, and he didn't even speak o n Nothing to it! I'm happy now and so's y wi I like my home, and I eat good; w , I' gained twenty-five pounds since I st pped And so on, an earnest, convinced testi ony the benefits of sobriety.



BOOZE FIGHTING

For the married man who cannot get along without drinks, the following is suggested as a means of freedom from bondage to the saloon:

"Start a saloon in your own house. Be the only customer. You'll have no license to pay. Go to your wife and give her two dollars to buy a gallon of whisky, and remember there are sixty-nine drinks in a gallon of whisky. Buy your drinks from no one but your wife, and by the time the first gallon is gone she will have eight dollars to put into the bank, and two dollars to start business again. Should you live ten years and continue to buy booze from her, and then die with snakes in your boots, she will have enough money to bury you decently, educate your children, buy a house and lot, marry a decent man, and quit thinking about you entirely."

In one form and another this unanswerable argument (copied here from a Cleveland Hardware Company placard) is displayed in many a shop and office

They're "making men," and they won ecce defeat. That they're held to this by Hen Ford is certain. "Tell the committee hey have to guess again," he sent word in ply a report that said a man was hopele , a had better be discharged. "Do you an tell me that a great big concern li t with all the time and money it need mu give up a poor weak wretch that p ba never had a chance? Make a man hı Find a way."

"Find a way" is becoming in score of tl greatest and richest manufacturing conc ns the country the rule in regard to drink it in regard to safety. I doubt indeed if ere any agency today making anything ke s persistent, spirited, ingenious an attack n th use of liquor as that of our modern in stri managements. The attack is only just egui It is bound to go on as is that on long our unfair distribution of profits, ineff ency autocracy of management, "blind all s"— every evil that hampers the full devel men of industrial life. Progress will be th mor rapid because it is becoming clear o s many that here, as at other points, that whic was looked on as a purely moral que on i also an economic question. It is anotl on of accumulating proofs that only good oral are good business.

ON this type of employer their hard- ade colleagues have made a sharp ack They were engaged in a struggle to es blisl the principle that humanity had notl g t do with business. The man who pr ticed it was false to his class. Business h bu one end, and that was profits. The relations o hos in it consequently were impersonal and mech ical Such a conception of any human undertaking is ounc to fail. It is contrary to the nature of man. Ha anc brutal and greedy as they may exhibit them lves there is in them all wells of sentiment, of good f ling of love of justice. These springs can be cappe unti they dry up, but it takes years to do it.

The realization by progressive industry th the hard conception that greed and narrowness hav ried to fasten on it was a fatal economic error has c e to thousands of younger men as a revelation. has loosened powers and impulses and enthusiasms hich they had never suspected in themselves. Th are finding in business possibilities for service, for c zenship, for the development of both themselves and ose under their direction, which give to work a new an-ing, to moral issues a fresh reason. It is this loo ing of their powers which is giving new life to many old hope of this tormented world, and among them t t of a day when no man will put an enemy into his uth to steal away his brains.

Billy Sunday at Ocean Grove

EVANGELIST W. A. SUNDAY'S nine-day campaign at Ocean Grove, N. J., has come and gone and it was a notable success. He spoke to great gatherings in the Auditorium and on one Sunday he preached at three different services, the attendance aggregating 30,000. There were fifteen meetings in all, and the evangelist left behind him a message that will not soon be forgotten. At one service there were in the audience the present governor of the state and a former governor. There were penitents and numerous conversions, but no figures concerning these were available.

One sermon, addressed specially to men, and bearing the title "Chickens Come Home to Roost," was full of the old-time spiritual "punch." The speaker said:

"I'LL not compromise one bit with sin. I'll do anything to help you. No man will argue that sin is a good thing. Not one who does not believe that the community would be better off if there was no sin. I preach against vice to show you that it will make your girl an outcast and your boy a drunkard."

"You say you're not afraid of sin. You ought to be for your children. It doesn't take boys long to get on the wrong track, and while you are scratching gravel to make one lap your boy makes ten. We've got kids who have not yet sprouted long breeches who know more about sin and vice than Methuselah. There are little frizzle-top sissies not yet sprouting long dresses who know more about vice than did their great-grandmothers when they were 75 years old. The girl who drinks will abandon her virtue. What did Methuselah know about smoking cigarettes?"

Mr. and Mrs. Sunday consider future plans

"As a rule a man wants something better for his children than he has had for himself. My father died before I was born and I lived with my grandfather. He smoked, but he did not want me to. He chewed, but he didn't want me to. He drank, but he n't want me to. He cussed, but he didn't want n to. He made wine that would make a man fight his wn mother after he had drunk it. I remember how I sed to find the bottle and suck the wine through a aw or an onion top."

"No man can be a good husband, no man can a good father, no man can be a gentleman, and s ar. You can hang out a sign of gentleman, but wher ou cuss you might as well take it in."

"There is in the hearts of men a force which c ins them and drags them in the dust. Society is orga ed around the idea that men have a natural tenden to sin. This idea is back of every social and every m-inal law on the statute books. You may not lik he doctrine of original sin, but unless you are a n ral idiot you cannot deny the fact that there is an in rn tendency to sin."

"What is your life? A hand's breadth—yes, a h 's breadth—yes, one single heartbeat, and you are g e, and yet you sit with the judgment of God hove ng over you. 'What shall the end be?'"

"There is throbbing in the breast of every man d every woman, of the hurrying, pushing, rus g. surging crowd in the street, a force that woos t n, pleads with them, calls them to the highest in lif s the sun kisses moisture into the skies."

Cleaning Up the Slums of Rio de Janeiro

By H. C. TUCKER

UNDER an ignorant and suspicious conservatism the city of Rio de Janeiro had grown most unhygienic and its business districts had become most inadequate. The streets were narr and badly paved; the houses small, poorly vent ted and without proper sewerage. Yellow fever and her diseases annually slew their thousands. Epic ics spread out over the bay and claimed hundred f victims among the sailors on foreign vessels. The k of port facilities and the very narrow rough stree were seriously hindering commerce. But the day me when there was a demand for change and impr ement.

A tle more than a decade ago we missionaries of the ople's Central Institute, Rio de Janeiro, placed in th hands of a bright Brazilian physician literature on t subject of the mosquito theory of the transmission disease and the story of the extermination of he llow fever from Havana and other infected citie The president of the Board of Health, Dr. Osw lo da Cruz, caught a vision of a clean and heal ul city. Engineers at the same time were seeing visic of a beautiful city with wide streets and commod s buildings, and business men were dreaming drea of an improved harbor and of modern facilities for t de and transportation. In a very short time a grea hange took place. Wide and well-paved streets, new d well-ventilated buildings and three miles of mod wharf facilities were constructed.

T process of change and the introduction of revolutic zing inventions were admitted among the people nost without question and did their work of tran rmation. Large sections of the city, however, were ractically untouched except by the overcrowding asioned by the moving in of multitudes driven out buildings being torn down and by the thousands of la rers coming from outside to find employment on t works of reconstruction. The congestion of busi ss and traffic was relieved, but the congestion of popu tion and of living was increased. While statesmen conomists and business and professional men were usy with schemes of industrial and hygienic betern t we were seeing visions of moral and social need nd investigation revealed the real conditions in which the masses of the people were living. Colpor eur f the American Bible Society were sent to distribu Scriptures among these workmen and their fami s. Their reports of the interest awakened in he ding of the Bible by many of the people for the irst me led us to call together a small group of frien weekly for prayer and guidance that help migl be obtained to conserve the results of this work. We eatly needed a place in which we might gather the ople to be instructed more perfectly in the way of G . A Christian gentleman in London, the contrac for the port works, who at the time knew nothing of the Bible work going on and of our prayer circle, made a generous gift which supplied funds for renting a hall; other friends made donations for furnishing, lighting, and other requisites. We began the work with preaching services on Sunday and two evenings a week. A Sunday school was soon organized; a kindergarten and primary day school followed immediately; reading and game rooms were provided for all who might take advantage of them. These features of the work were scarcely in operation when the need for medical attention and other relief became apparent. A dispensary was opened; medical advice and medicines were provided, and also a dental clinic. The children in the school were taught the use of the toothbrush in a daily drill just after luncheon. Night classes were organized for a large number of young people who work in the day time and are without educational advantages and training.

WE were now getting in touch with many children and young and older people. We felt, however, that in order to accomplish the largest results and to make the widest possible application of the Gospel message of salvation we needed to know more about the actual conditions in which the people were living and toiling for daily bread. A young man, a convert from the slums, was instructed and then employed to go from house to house and learn all he possibly could. His reports would run as follows: On one side of a certain section of a street there are 27 buildings occupied as residences, 13 stores and shops of different kinds, 21 vendas, 5 cafés, 1 beer factory, 5 storehouses for rum, 1 hotel, 1 lottery agency and 1 postal agency.

There are living in these houses 89 families, composed of 457 persons, 342 of whom are above twelve years of age and 115 under twelve; only 200 reported that they could read and write, and 257 are illiterate. There is an average of more than five persons to a family; there is less than one sitting-room to each family, and only two little bedrooms, which requires that in most cases three persons on an average sleep in one room.

The conditions thus prevailing bore directly upon the physical, social and moral life and had to be taken into account in any effort that we might make. There were no playgrounds or open-air spaces for the children, and no public parks or gardens near. Families were crowded together in a way that gave rise to quarrels, contentions and many social evils and difficulties; the vilest kind of cheap rum could be had at 27 different places in that short space, and the lottery ticket was ever being held out and urged on the attention of every person passing by.

This information was invaluable to those seeking to awaken and educate the masses, to create in the hearts of the people desires and aspirations after better things, and to minister to the wants of soul and body. Our mission was designed to be a social, intellectual and spiritual center, where the people might find in some degree the things that were so evidently lacking in their home environment.

TO meet some of these very apparent physical and social needs we began to plan for physical exercise, games, an out-door playground, and concerts, lantern pictures and entertainments. Appeal was made to the superintendent of municipal gardens for space in one of the nearest public parks for a playground. Lack of information as to the value of play and the meaning of a modern, well-equipped playground made it necessary to repeat the request many times before there was any favorable response. Finally the superintendent requested us to meet him in one of the parks quite a long distance from our mission; it was almost out of our reach. We were greatly surprised that morning when our friend drove up in his auto and introduced the mayor of the city, who had been persuaded to come out and see what we were driving at. Before we left the park two large plots of ground had been placed at our disposal, one for a playground and the other for an athletic field. A supply of modern apparatus and necessary material was secured. The expense of preparing the grounds and of installing the outfit was met by the municipal authorities. The mayor was present on the day of inauguration, furnished a band of music, gave us a national flag and made an address. The city now proposes to provide a modern playground for each new public school building to be erected.

Tuberculosis with its usual trail of suffering and calamity was found to be very prevalent among the masses of the poor in the overcrowded districts. Lantern slides and a lecture on tuberculosis and how to prevent its spread were secured through Dr. Josiah Strong of New York. Our American ambassador, Mr. Morgan, agreed to be present the first time the lecture was to be given; with his promise to attend we were able to secure the attendance also of the president of the City Board of Health, a representative of the mayor, the secretary of the interior of the federal government, the editor of the leading daily paper of the city and other newspaper men, and other influential persons; our people from the district filled the hall. At the close the "Don't Cards" in Portuguese were distributed, and we stated that we intended to follow up the work with other instructive and suggestive literature. The president of the Board of Health, Dr. Carlos Seidhl, asked us to give the lecture in the public schools, and a few days later requested that we give it in the evening to the people in the public squares. Thousands in the open air have listened with deep interest.

A seamen's mission is carried on successfully, with reading and game rooms, lodging and meals, religious and social work. We have an office where legal counsel and help is furnished. The large percentage of infant mortality in the community has led to instruction of the women in the principles of motherhood and the care of their little babes. In all this work we are seeking to understand and apply Christ's message of the Kingdom and to apprehend the social laws of love, service and sacrifice. It is the business of the People's Central Institute to win the individual soul to Christ and to create a Christian civilization. We believe the time has come when we must take the broader view of missionary work and adapt our methods to all human needs.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

RECORD OF CONGRESS. The first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress started out with a definite Administration program, the bulk of which was really enacted into law. The total of appropriations reached $1,626,439,000, the highest previous total for a single session being $1,114,937,000. Of the total, $685,709,000 was appropriated for the army, the navy and fortifications, being the cost of what is called preparedness. The Army Bill provided for a complete reorganization of the land forces of the Republic. The Naval Bill provided the greatest ship building program ever laid down by any government at one time. The Revenue Bill, which was expected to raise $200,000,000, levied taxes on inheritances and munitions of war, increased the income tax, but repealed the stamp tax and provided for a protective duty on dyestuffs. This bill also created the Tariff Commission. Congress passed the Administration Shipping Bill; the bill barring the products of child labor from interstate commerce, passing this only at the insistence of the President; the Rural Credits Bill; a workmen's compensation law for Federal employees; bills authorizing total deposits of $2,000 by one person in postal savings banks, uniform bills of lading, providing for a joint commission to investigate the transportation problem, establishing official grain standards, prohibiting false advertising and fake auctions in the District of Columbia; and, in the very last hours of the sessions, the eight-hour law was passed to halt the railway strike. Certain important measures failed; the corrupt practices bill was debated but failed to pass. This bill was intended to limit expenditures in primaries and elections of candidates for Federal offices. Conservation measures providing for the leasing of government oil, coal and phosphate lands passed the House but failed in the Senate. The Burnett Immigration Bill was also held up in the Senate, and this Congress failed to pass resolutions for the submission of proposed constitutional amendments for woman suffrage and national prohibition. The Webb Bill, designed to permit combinations of American exporters to meet foreign competition, also went over to the next session. The Senate, in spite of well-organized opposition, confirmed the nomination of Louis D. Brandeis as a justice of the Supreme Court. It rejected the nomination of George Rublee as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. The Senate also ratified the treaty providing for the purchase of the Danish West Indies, but failed to ratify the treaty by which Colombia was to receive $25,000,000 to compensate it for the loss of Panama. Perhaps the most exciting moments of the session were crowded into the few days in which Congress debated and laid upon the table resolutions of Senator Gore and Representative McLemore, which would have warned Americans not to travel on armed merchant-ships. During the session there were introduced into the House 17,800 bills, 369 resolutions, 303 joint resolutions and 60 concurrent resolutions.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED RAILWAYS. The Philippine government has purchased for $4,000,000 the Manila Railroad, the only railroad on the island of Luzon. The railroad has been in financial difficulties. It operates 350 miles of track.

PRESIDENT VISITS MEXICAN CONFERENCE. The American and Mexican commissioners are reported to be giving their first attention to the determination of the exact amount of power held and exercised by the Carranza government. The Mexican commissioners have shown that the present government of Mexico has 12,000 miles of railway in operation out of a total of 13,000 miles in the Republic. The monthly income has advanced from 3,000,000 to 25,000,000 pesos, paper currency, freight tonnage now carried being virtually the same as in 1912, the railways showing a surplus over expense of operation. Civil government is being established throughout the pacified area, ten states and the territory of Southern California being under civil government. Plans are proceeding for a complete revision of the constitution to make effective the purposes of the revolution, the revision of the constitution to be followed by elections within the states, then by a presidential election. The Carranza government has forbidden the governors of various states to issue decrees affecting the natural resources of the country and has nullified all laws and decrees previously dictated by governors. On September 12, President Wilson, who was in New London because of the fatal illness of his sister, received the Mexican commissioners on his yacht, the Mayflower, and later returned the visit at their hotel. He told them that he personally sympathized with the declared objects of the revolution, and he reminded them that the regeneration of Mexico must come from within.

MILITIAMEN MUSTERED OUT. It was announced after 15,000 state troops were ordered to return to the concentration camps of the north that these regiments were to be mustered out of the Federal service.

DANGEROUS CANDIDATING. President Diaz of Nicaragua has convoked an extraordinary session of the Nicaraguan Congress to consider reform of electoral laws. A presidential election is to be held in Nicaragua in November. The Liberal Party is accusing Diaz of following a dictatorial policy, their candidate for president having been excluded from the country for some time, but finally admitted, only to be fired upon by soldiers under the orders of a district governor, who was later removed from office.

THE COST OF THE LOAF. In connection with the discussion regarding the possible increase in the price of the five-cent loaf of bread, the Master Bakers' Association is giving the following table of increases within the last two years in the cost of materials used in making and marketing bread: Patent flour, 100 per cent.; rye, 124 per cent.; sugar, 66 per cent.; shortening, 60 per cent.; milk, 40 per cent.; salt, 14 per cent.; wrapping paper, 70 per cent. Delivery costs were also said to have increased through an advance of 100 per cent. in the price of gasoline and 25 per cent. in feed for horses.

FORD HAS TWO SUITS. Henry Ford of Detroit has sued the Chicago Tribune for $1,000,000 for alleging that he was an anarchist because of his opposition to the policy of preparedness. Mr. Ford, on the other hand, has been sued for libel for $100,000 by the Navy League of the United States because of his newspaper advertisements printed broadcast throughout the country impugning the motive of the League in furthering preparedness legislation.

THE DIVORCEE BANNED. The forthcoming general convention of the Episcopal Church will receive a recommendation from a commission of bishops and laymen, which will propose an amendment to the canon law by which an Episcopal clergyman will be forbidden to officiate at the remarriage of a divorced person.

SEEK PAYMENT OF AN OLD DEBT. During the Revolutionary War Hyman Solomon of Philadelphia was said to have given George Washington various sums to a total of $660,000 to finance the American Revolution. Congress once ordered the money refunded to the son, Hyman, Junior, but the papers reached him on the Jewish Sabbath and he refused to sign them until Monday. On Sunday he dropped dead. A movement to establish a university as a memorial to Solomon having failed, the present heirs are now planning to petition Congress to restore the money to them.

AN OLD PRESBYTERY. On September 12 the Presbytery of Long Island celebrated its two hundredth anniversary. This presbytery was the first formed in the state of New York. It was organized under the authority of the Presbytery of Philadelphia. From this Presbytery of Long Island there has developed the present Pre yter of Nassau, the Brooklyn Pres ter and the Synod of New York, vhic alone embraces 900 Presb eria churches.

the heavy steel members were torn apart, and with a crash and a splash the span, which was to have marked the final triumph of engineering genius, disappeared into the waters of the St. Lawrence and settled to the bottom, 200 feet below, carrying with it at least eleven of the workmen. The project was first proposed in 1853 and has been under serious consideration since 1882. When completed, the bridge was to carry two railroad tracks, two street car tracks and two roadways, and would have shortened the transcontinental trip from Halifax by 200 miles. The total cost of the bridge, if completed according to the original plans, was to have been $17,000,000.

THEY DO NOT SPEAK OUR TONGUE. According to a study of the census figures made by the Department of the Interior, out of 13,000,000 persons of foreign birth in the United States, 3,000,000, mostly men and women of voting age, are unable to speak and understand English. "America First" posters printed in seven languages have been displayed from one end of the country to the other to assist local authorities in getting these immigrants into night schools.

VILLA DEFEATED AGAIN. Villistas, numbering above 2,000, said to have been under the direct command of Villa himself, attacked Chihuahua City on Saturday, September 16. They captured the penitentiary, releasing prisoners and took the federal and state palaces, being surrounded there by Carranza troops under General Trevino. The battle raged all day, the Villistas finally being driven out and put to flight at 9 P.M. with a loss of over 250 men killed, besides many prisoners. The prisoners were executed. The Carranza losses are not disclosed.

EX-MAYOR LOW DIES. Seth Low, former mayor of Brooklyn and of Greater New York, and for many years president of Columbia University, died at Bedford Hills, New York, September 17. Mr. Low was born in 1850, graduated from Columbia in 1870, and entered political life in 1878. He fought for clean politics and efficient government. He served on many important commissions.

EPIDEMIC YIELDS SLOWLY. During the week September 3 to 10 the daily average of cases of infantile paralysis in New York was 50.2 and in the week of September 17 it was 36.28, but Friday and Saturday showed slight increases over the days just preceding. The totals for Greater New York to September 17 are: cases, 8,731, deaths, 2,1[illegible]. Of the first 7,000 cases, 6,521 families reported one each, 205 families two each, twenty families three each, one family four and one five.

PUTTING NEW YORK ON ITS FEET. The new strike on the transportation lines of New York has apparently failed, although during the week between September 10 and 17 many New Yorkers discovered anew the primitive methods of locomotion of their forebears. Vehicles of ancient lineage appeared from dusty corners of old stables, automobiles of all ages did their turn of service, but many people really walked. Each day during the week saw more cars running, until by September 16 the subway and elevated were running normal service without strikebreakers and the surface lines were operating about one-third of their cars. A threatened general strike of all union labor was reduced during the week to a threat to call out the 75,000 engaged in trades whose labor directly or indirectly served the traction companies. On Friday, September 15, the Central Federated Union voted to call out these workers. But as this issue of the Christian Herald goes to press only the longshoremen and the tidewater boatmen had voted to strike, and they demanded redress of grievances of their own and declare that their action was not a sympathetic strike. The mayor and Public Service Commission have condemned as breach of contract the sympathetic strikes called on the surface lines to help the subway and elevated strikers, which seem to be defeated. At this writing it appears likely that the surface lines will succeed in reestablishing operation on a non-union basis and that by calling the sympathetic strike the union men have lost all they won in the settlements of August 6 and 7.

A PROPHET OR A DECEIVER. The state election in Maine on September 10 was looked forward to by both political parties as more or less of a barometer of national feeling, and the returns from the election were expected to forecast something of the possible results in November. The Republican committee forecasted a plurality of 15,000 votes for the candidate for governor. The Democrats claimed to expect to carry the state by 3,000. The vote was Republican by a plurality of eleven to thirteen thousand, the Republicans electing the governor, both senators and all of the state's representatives.

JAPAN DENIES COVETOUSNESS. It has been charged that the incident at Chengchiatun, out of which grew the recent Japanese demands upon China, was deliberately provoked by the Japanese. The Japanese foreign minister, however, being interrogated by the American minister at Tokyo, under instructions from Washington, has expressly declared that there was nothing in the demands infringing the sovereignty of China, and nothing impairing the Root-Takahira agreement. The American minister at Peking reports, however, that the Chinese government considers the demands as distinctly imperiling its sovereignty.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE military and political situation in the Balkans, as far as the latter situation affects the military, continued to be the center of interest in the week of September 7 to 15, and particular interest has attached to the interior situation in Greece, as on the outcome depends whether or not Greece will enter the war on the side of the Allies.

Premier Zaimis resigned late last week with the entire cabinet. Attempts were made by the king and also by the Entente diplomatic representatives to have Zaimis and his colleagues reconsider their determination, but unsuccessfully. The king then called on Mr. Dimitrikopulos, a former cabinet minister, to undertake the formation of a new cabinet, but this gentleman, after trying three or four days to do so, on Friday, September 15, it is reported, informed the king that the task was too great for him, so the crisis continues. Toward the end of the week there was some rioting in Athens, in the course of which for some unknown reason the French legation building was attacked, for which attack Greece has made apologies and amends. The Greek papers say that in the surrender of the various forts in the northeastern part of Greece to the Bulgarians, a large portion of the Greek army's equipment of artillery was turned over to the Bulgars, said to amount to some 600 guns of all kinds, including twenty complete batteries of the light 75's, as well as the bulk of the Greek supply of ammunition, amounting in value to $24,000,000.

From German sources we are informed that the fourth Greek army corps, originally stationed on the line from Seres to Kavala, when it found itself cut off from communication with Athens and the Greek military authorities by the events in Salonica, of which mention has been made in prior summaries, through its commanding general requested protection and supplies from the commander-in-chief of the forces of the Central Empires, and that an arrangement was made subsequently whereby these Greek troops were to be transported with their arms and equipment into the interior of Germany, where they were to remain in the status of neutrals until events permitted their return to Central Greece.

On the northern border of Greece the British have been attacking in force the Bulgarian positions on the northeast bank of the Struma River to the east of the eastern line of the Allies' battleline, which positions, my readers may remember, outflank on the east the Allies' battleline and render any direct advance impossible until the Bulgars are driven from these positions. In their efforts the British have crossed the Struma at points and have taken several villages, but have not up to the present time taken contact with the main Bulgarian forces. In the center of the Allies' line the French are keeping up a determined bombardment of the Bulgarian positions in the Vardar Valley, but their infantry has as yet made no serious effort to move forward.

On the other wing, south of Florina, the Serbians are attacking the Bulgarian positions fiercely and have made quite marked progress. Farther west, in southern Albania, the Italians are continuing their attacks on the Austrian wedge which interposes itself between their troops at Avlona and the Allies, but so far without making much impression.

ON the South Rumania front, that is to say that portion of the kingdom south of the Danube, the Bulgarians seem to be having things their own way, and at the end of the period under review appear to have conquered about 10,000 square kilometers of the Dobrudja, as this district is called, or more thereof than they were obliged to make over to the Rumanians

The Higher Righteousness

*A SERMON BY REV. A. H. TUTTLE

TEXT—John 16 : 8. "When he is come, he will reprove the world of righteousness."

THE word "reprove," which occurs in our common version, is not an adequate rendering. The word in the margin, "convince," is better. But even it is not large enough; for the work of the Holy Spirit is not simply to inform, but also to bring to the conscience with sharp reproof the information it conveys. The new version unites both these ideas in the word "convict," and so is the best rendering.

"He will convict the world of sin." That we can understand. The Holy Spirit is not needed merely to make men aware of sin or to condemn it. That we have by nature. It is manifest to us in "the things that are made." Whatever lowers the content and power of manhood is wrong and the entire visible world proclaims it. We also know sin by the law. When the word of authority gives forth "Thou shalt not," then "by the law is the knowledge of sin." So also our conscience in some measure helps to the knowledge of sin and brings with it a strong reproof. Nature, law, conscience, are the threefold witness of sin. But when the Spirit does its work of convincing and reproving, it goes deeper and farther than this threefold testimony. Then the soul is oppressed with such a sense of the enormity of sin as to turn our day into night. We hear the mutterings of the judgment thunder. Our hearts quail before the terrors of the Lord. That experience by common consent is called conviction. Many contend that without it there is no escape from sin, and no entrance into the life divine.

But in the passage I have read, Jesus tells us that this same Spirit produces conviction of righteousness. We do not need the Holy Spirit merely to know that there is a difference between right and wrong. That we know by nature, law and conscience. Every man has some moral sense. There is such a thing as natural virtue. Socrates, Plato, Aurelius and others are notable instances of men who never heard of the descent of the Spirit, yet exhibited in their own persons magnificent virtues. In Christian times, noble examples abound of men and women of resplendent virtues who did not profess the saving grace of Christ. Bushnell calls them "outside saints." There are moral men in the community, generous, self-sacrificing, kindly, heroic, who cannot understand how Christians can speak of them as unsaved, when their characters equal and in some instances eclipse those of the saints. It is the work of the Spirit to convict them of righteousness.

When the Spirit does illumine the soul of an upright man, he sees righteousness as never before. His virtues, in the blaze of this new light, seem shallow, unreal, altogether insufficient. The conscientious, upright Paul of blameless life calls his righteousness "filthy rags." This conviction of righteousness comes to many of us before the conviction of sin. They who came up into Christ from a consecrated childhood, who did not long ago go groaning under a burden of their sins, are sure sooner or later to come to see how far short of the glory of God they have lived. Then the Spirit convicts them of righteousness. Only the Holy Spirit can bring the character of this righteousness to your minds with conviction.

IT is inward. A man may be correct in deed but wrong at heart. He may tell the truth but love the lie. He may never steal but covet his neighbor's goods. He may so modify the law as to be able to keep the letter while he openly violates its spirit. He may boast that he has never committed murder, yet he has hated his brother without a cause. He may keep the whole law as did the young man in the Gospel story, yet like him violate both its fundamental principles—love to God and love to man. He may never suspect where his supreme love is until it is put to the test—"Go sell all." Men guilty of sin at heart would stone the woman who was guilty of sin in an act, until Jesus' searching question confounded them. "Men compound sins they are inclined to, by damning those they have no mind to."

It is real. A woman is reputed to be a model wife. She devotes herself, patiently and laboriously, to her husband's interests. Day and night through the weary years she keeps his house, cares for his children, studies his wishes, and in every detail does everything a wife can do for his happiness. But she does not love him. Her heart is in the grave of a companion of her youth. Hers was a marriage of convenience. Hence in that home everything rings hollow. It is not real. With all her faithfulness, she gives her husband a stone for bread, a scorpion for fish.

Righteousness is often as faithful, as painful and as unreal as that. The reality of our righteousness is determined by two things: first, that in which the holiness of God has its most perfect expression, and secondly, the motive by which we pursue it. When God called Abraham, he said: "Walk thou before me and be thou perfect." Abraham was a good man before the call; but now he is called to a higher righteousness, the "perfect." Heretofore, he regulated his life by moral principles alone; now he is to live in conscious union with God. Moving with God and under the inspiration of his person, he became the founder of the church of Israel, from which came our Christ. There is need of a striking personality to give concrete expression to the ideal of righteousness; and that we have in Christ. And there is nothing that makes it so real in our pursuit of it as the contagion of that personality. The real righteousness is to "live by faith of the son of God."

IT is free. The charm of freedom characterizes the genuine in righteousness as it does in literature and art. What an ease of utterance appears in the best poetry! Tennyson said he wrote with no thought of rules. There was no need. The song in his heart poured itself out with the abandon of the songbirds. The perfect result reveals a method by which it was done, and this, when analyzed by the critic, is known as the poetic law. But let any or his thought by that law rather than by the r passion that throbs in his soul, and his music is

The righteousness which the Holy Spirit is not a compulsion but a blessed freedom.

IT is full. Not in the sense that it has the and height and glory of the eternal God eousness, for that would be to make the finite the infinite; but it is full in the sense that the lies in the heart of the acorn. Eve said of l born: "I have gotten a man from the Lord infant was a man in potentiality. A great writer has said, "The soul is a vast for God." Professor Hastings adds anoth "elastic." The soul is a vast and elastic cap God. "The more the heart is crowded divine presence, the greater room there is f of that presence." As our daily life unfolds n more, God fills it with himself, his truth, hi his joy, his holiness.

But the truth I wish to emphasize now is everlasting unfolding of righteousness, but that every element of the righteousness of already essentially present in the Spirit-l man. THE DREAM

By H. Thompson Rich

I DREAMED a strange dream. Flowers bloomed all about,
And there were butterflies upon the breeze,
And laughing brooks that gurgled to bright seas,
And lakes that bass leaped in, and silver trout.
But while I watched, the sun went slowly out;
And there came distant sound of falling trees;
And men and women sank upon their knees,
And everything was swallowed up in doubt.

Then, to the martial roll of fife and drum,
Corps upon corps I saw vast armies come,
Endless—a thousand men in every line;
And at the front a boy marched on ahead,
Bearing a banner with the awful sign:
We are the avenging Armies of the Dead!

HOMELESS

By Irene H. Wilson

STAR, be my candle bright,
Far in the sky;
Moon, watch me from thine height
With thy calm eye;

Snow, take me to thy breast;
There let me cling;
Night, shield my wearied rest
'Neath thy dark wing;

Wind, as thy fingers strong
O'er tree-harps sweep,
Sing me thy wild, sweet song;
Lull me to sleep.

PAUSE and reflect, nor mar a stainless p e
With words reflecting an unworthy thoug t;
But let some psalm of life thy soul engage:
Then, with the limpid inspiration caught,
Rise, and say thy say.

Live in ideals that lift thy nature higher,
So that, mayhap, some grosser nature, lit
May kindle at thy flame, and so aspire
To brighter ways through it.

Mar not a life, from God's hands issuing cle n,
With thoughts and deeds that sully and d le.
Live in his sunshine, where its limpid sheen

Settling Down in Christ

SUNDAY, October 1. John 15 : 4. "Abide in me." The Lord Jesus calls us to a settled life in his fellowship. But the difficulty is, our nature is so truant. The majority of us can- settle down anywhere in anything. We are pos- ed of a spirit of restlessness, and we are the willing ims of constant change. We rush from one thing nother, and we do not tarry long enough at any- g to make it disburse its treasure. It is a case of h and go, not of quiet entry and deep possession. l so it is in our supreme relationship to Christ. are vagrants, knocking occasionally at his door. are rovers, paying him infrequent visits. We do settle down and abide in him.

t is a very practical and familiar word which the ster uses. It is used many times in the New Tes- ent in its ordinary everyday relationship: "Zac- us, come down, for today I must abide at thy se!" "Abide with us, for the day is far spent." Lord invites us to live in him. Many of us go ar as to make him our church, where we occasion- worship him. Or we make him our hospital in se seasons when calamity is upon us, and our life l in pieces. Or we regard him as a kind of spiritual lth-resort where we go now and again to take the licinal waters. But we do not make him our home. visit him, we do not live with him. We look in, we do not abide.

nd this it is, this want of a settled life, which kes our influence so capricious, and our service so ken. Our religious life is a series of incalculable sms. It is like the eruptions of an irregular gey- and not the ceaseless flowings of a noble river. yet it is the river which provides the Scriptural bol of a deep and healthy life. "Then had thy ce been like a river," abounding in great energy, endid in its impressiveness, wonderful in its con- uity.

erhaps it may be truly said, even of our church , that is too often a series of distractions which d to make us erratic in spirit; and we wander ut from cistern to cistern, just sipping of what supposed to be the water of life, but having no ding communion with the Spring. We need to tle down to deep and ever deepening fellowship h our Lord. We must make our home in him if would know the joy and peace and power of the d. In Christ is our salvation. J. H. J.

Communion with God

MONDAY, October 2. Judges 6 : 11-24. "And Gideon said." In the brief narrative of Gideon's rious exploits, these words occur five times, and ven times we read the corresponding words, "And Lord said unto Gideon." We have here, there- e, not so much one prolonged utterance of prayer, t the colloquy of a devoted soul with the heavenly ther, in which they spake together as a man speak- with his friend. Prayer was one prolonged inter- nge of communication between the divine and man. Let us dwell on this for a little, because a ilar habit of familiar intercourse was maintained stantly between Moses, the man of God, and his at Partner and Ally. It may be ours also.

It is, of course, clear that friendship with God, like t with our fellows, cannot rest content even with s prolonged conversation, continued day and night. r all true friends, there must be times of intimate nmunion, unbroken by trivialities or business. must ascend to the mountains, or go apart into desert place. Human friendship demands oppor- ities, when heart shall reveal itself to heart. The ld things of the forest will not show themselves ile you are walking along the beaten track and the nches are snapping under your tread. It is only en you sit down and wait that the bird will call to mate, or the timid furry inhabitants of the burrows ll stealthily creep forth. When these seasons of ayer are the habitual custom, the soul will more dily maintain the practice of unceasing intercourse. e shall walk with God. We shall say things to him thout kneeling down or isolating ourselves from e immediate circumstances in which we spend our es. We shall speak and he will answer. F. B. M.

When Sacrifice Counts

TUESDAY, October 3. Rom. 8 : 13. "But if ye through the Spirit do put to death the deeds the body, ye shall live." The thing that makes sacrifice count is the love that is behind it, and not the grief or the hard sense of duty. "And if I give my body to be burned," says Paul, "and have not love, it profiteth me nothing." The pain and the death of sacrifice must be swallowed up in victory—the victory of love. Life is promised to those who "through the Spirit" put to death the deeds of the body.

We once met a man from the West in Japan, in an out-of-the-way place, living the life virtually of a hermit. No one seemed to know much about him, and he was known as the "silent man" in that little country hamlet of the Sunrise Kingdom. Meeting him one day, I engaged him in conversation, and was amazed to find his knowledge; he was a graduate of a large Western University and he possessed unusual ability in several lines.

"Why are you living like this?" I asked.

"A great disappointment," he answered, "has driven me to this. I came out here resolved never to see the face of men I knew again, since they reminded me of my sorrow. This little town is my cloister cell."

It seemed that the root of his sacrifice was not love, but a selfish repugnance of the world. The strain that ran through his sacrifice was grief and a jaundiced view of men and things. Paul shows us that the Spirit demands quite a different kind of giving up. Its sacrifices are shot through with joy; the loss is not an impoverishment but a gain all around; in the sacrifice "through the Spirit" there is not a living death but a fresh inflow of life; "ye shall live," says the apostle, as the result of spiritual surrenders.

Christian sacrifice should always have a loving, unselfish object. Its atmosphere is the spirit of gladness and willingness, for the sake of the greater glory to be revealed in us and in others. Such sacrifice does not shun the world; it lightens it. C. S. C.

Trusting God for Great Things

WEDNESDAY, October 4. Judges 15 : 9-20. "And he was sore athirst and called on the Lord." We are told that Samson lived by faith. He is included in the illustrious list of the heroes of the faith recorded in Heb. 11. It is commonly supposed that he was a man of Herculean proportions, whose huge frame and mighty muscles betrayed the secret of his great strength. But a further and closer consideration of his life-story confirms the opinion that he was in all respects as ordinary men, for otherwise his wife would not have asked him to tell her the secret of his great strength. Clearly, he drew his strength from God by the appeal of faith, which draws its supplies from the fulness of Deity. When some great feat was demanded, he naturally turned to the eternal source of strength and drew all that he required for the fulfilment of his task. This becomes the habit of the child of God. At any moment he turns the switch of faith, and there is the exact and instant response.

The argument employed here by Samson is extremely interesting. He had witnessed, and been the instrument of, a great deliverance. This was for the nation, but now a great need had arisen for himself. Would God be unmindful of the instrument? Would he not care for his servant? Did not the greater include the less? Child of God, you have been greatly used! Be of good cheer; you shall not die of thirst, neither shall you fall into the hand of the enemy! "He that spared not his own Son, but gave him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give you all things?" F. B. M.

God's Love and Care for All His Children

THURSDAY, October 5. Ps. 94 : 9. "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" This ancient question of the psalmist has been a difficult one for the would-be skeptic to answer. He who looks upon God as merely a great Force in the universe must show me what I shall gain in giving up the psalmist's evident belief that the eye of our God never slumbers or sleeps above his people, and that as the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so God is intelligently and lovingly round about his own.

We heard Mr. Henry Ford explaining his views about peace recently. Said he, "If peace is not the thing to be sought for by all of us, with our means and our efforts, our whole civilization is awry."

Likewise if I could not believe that my God had intelligence, the powers of affection and the ability to aid in time of need, I should find little solace and incentive to believe in him and present him to others.

A godly man, who lost his dear life-companion some time ago, was for a time inconsolable. Suddenly a change came in his attitude. His spirit revived and he took fresh hold on life. In a letter he wrote, "One night it suddenly came over me that God knows, and I realized that now she knows, and I became satisfied to wait for their answer."

Yes, dear troubled heart, God knows, and he also cares.

"He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" If our best earthly friend knows and cares, can we expect less of him whose attributes we only dimly reflect? We act on the firm belief of the knowledge and sympathy of a wife or a husband; can we not act and live as those who believe in the personal knowledge of a divine Father and Friend? C. S. C.

The True Spirit of Believing Prayer

FRIDAY, October 6. I Sam. 1 : 1-28. "She was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore." The picture drawn here of Hannah in prayer is very touching. She had sat with her husband and her rival at the usual yearly family-feast in the court of the tabernacle. While they had eaten and drank, she had been bathed in tears; and when the feast was ended, she stole away by herself into some recess apart from the crowd, though within view of Eli, as he sat on his usual seat beside the entrance. "She spoke in her heart." She had learned that God's true sanctuary is not in temples made with hands, and that those who would worship the great Spirit must worship in spirit. Her thoughts were not uttered in language intelligible to the human ear, but in groanings that could not be uttered. She continued praying, but she spoke in her heart. Her lips moved, but her voice was not heard; yet she poured out her soul before the Lord.

That is true prayer, when one turns the heart-pitcher upside down and pours out its contents at the feet of Christ. "Ye people," cries the psalmist, "pour out your heart before him; God is a refuge for us." And Jeremiah says, making the image still more explicit: "Pour out thine heart like water before the face of the Lord." When we do this, an assurance of the coming answer is given. The divine Spirit conveys to our heart the consciousness that God has granted the petition that we have asked of him, and we go our way, and our countenance is no more sad. Thus the hour comes at last when we stand again on the spot where we had previously poured out our prayer, saying, "Come ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul." "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and delivered him from all his fears." "For this . . . I prayed, and the Lord hath given me the petition that I desired of him." F. B. M.

The Glory in the Face of Jesus

SATURDAY, October 7. II Cor. 4 : 6. "The glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Moses once saw something of the glory of God's goodness pass before him, but how much more when he was on the Mount of Transfiguration! Light from the face of Christ shines in every convert's heart, revealing pardon and peace. Nearly every great artist has sought to portray the glory on the face of Jesus, but the finite ever fails to picture that expression of longing love poured out upon mankind, or the matchless gentleness of infinite compassion resting upon the multitudes to whom Jesus spake.

Hoffman's Christ was gazed upon with holy delight by Miss Frances Willard on the last day of her fatal illness. Leonardo da Vinci has pictured the sorrowing, sympathetic Saviour with closed eyes and bent form, in the exquisite anguish of Gethsemane. The beloved John has given to men a word painting from his own inner life experience that exceeds all others. He mixed his colors on the palette of his heart; he painted a little of the real glory of divinity, making the Christ-face mirror the Father in his everlasting love and beauty.

Matthew pictured Christ for the Jewish people; Mark for the Romans; Luke for the Gentiles; but the beloved John painted for all the world the picture of the Divine Logos. Others portrayed the Son of Man, but he the Son of God. By one stroke of the pen, Godlike features appeared: "the Word became flesh." The whole glory of the Gospel of Christ is concentrated in that flash of eloquence. "Behold the Lamb of God" gives the crimson colors to the masterpiece of the beautiful portrayal. E. W. C.

Light Breaking Through

THAT Europe's heart, sick of the long war, is turning toward peace, is made increasingly evident by the outspoken utterances of statesmen and the press in many quarters. Some journals have confidently predicted the end of the war before the coming winter; others, that it will last another year. One thing alone is certain: that it will come to an end as surely as it had a beginning, and, for a time at least, the sadness will be forgotten in the rejoicing.

In these last few months a marked change has come over the spirit of Europe. Great schemes of conquest are no longer discussed with approval. Neither is the "crushing" of any nation seriously considered in any of the leading European journals, although such topics were common enough a year ago. The people's voice is finding utterance after the long silence. Labor is actively looking forward to conditions after the war, and planning for the restoration of its organic rights and privileges. The Socialists on the Continent are protesting against schemes of conquest. Journals that have been tremblingly conservative are now speaking out loudly, regardless of censorships. The ominous threats of a "war after the war"—of nations clashing in a ruinous trade rivalry—are dying down. There is a sense of the coming restoration of moral and mental equilibrium and of natural conditions which cannot be misinterpreted.

And the spiritual sense, which seemed to have been stricken almost unconscious for a time, is hopefully reawakening. There is a reaction against plans which contemplate the dominance of any nation, or its commercial or military supremacy, as an outcome of the war. Another cheering sign is the growing tendency toward a kindlier international spirit. The war is humanizing the nations anew. There is a larger tolerance than would have been thought possible a year ago. Men who are foes in the field pay tribute to their opponents. National hatreds are burning themselves out. The souls of Europe's millions are being purged as by fire. In countless ways the humane Christlike spirit is reasserting itself.

If we are merely to estimate the results of the war in commercial, industrial and territorial terms the great struggle will have been to little purpose. The spiritual outcome gives promise of outweighing all the others. In the church itself there are evidences of a mighty change in progress. It is no longer blind to its shortcomings and its failures, to the perversion of its opportunities and its sacred office, when it fanned the flames of strife and lent its eloquence and influence to the stirring up of national antagonisms. It lauded the lust of conquest and love of power instead of teaching the doctrines of Him who urged all men to brotherly love and forgiveness.

There have been times during the last two years when men's souls were gripped with the dread of a reversion to the Dark Ages. They blamed the church for its indifference, its spiritual inertia, its failure to oppose a united protest against the so-called Christian nations rushing into fratricidal strife. They have even called the church apostate, because of its silent sanction in a crisis which has turned the whole world upside down. They have instanced the frantic appeals to arms that came from many pulpits and which were worthy of a pagan priesthood, but not of a Christian ministry. In justice let it be said, however, that the church could no more have prevented the war than Noah could have averted the flood. Foreseeing the coming disaster, he warned the people and preached repentance. So in the church a few brave men spoke the words of warning and have continued to speak them. Today they are pointing out the lessons of the great war and the church's opportunity. It needs a new consecration, a deep spiritual quickening, to fit it for the work before it. If the church is to take its rightful place and perform efficient and acceptable service after the war, it must prepare now. Its old alliances with wealth and power, its partnership with the world and its pleasures, its toleration of false ideals, its indifference to the fate of the neglected masses in the highways and byways, its silence concerning evils that should have called for stern denunciation, its timid acquiescence in conditions that shame civilization—all of these and many more are fetters that impede it at every step and which must be broken if the church of Christ is again to be loyal and true to its divine Founder. It must be first, last and always a Gospel church, forever free and unencumbered, giving its message to the world as Jesus would have it given, as the church in apostolic days gave it, and as it needs more than at any period in history to be given today.

In these trying times there are, thank God, many brave witnesses in the church—many ministers who have kept the faith and have not bowed the knee to the Baal of militarism, munitions, profits and preparedness, or chosen the arm of flesh as the defense of nations. All honor to these devoted pastors who risked the loss of friends, position, influence and the world's approval, and spoke the message of truth at the right moment, and are speaking it still. Such men there are in every denomination. They have kept the altar fires burning and preached the truth as the Holy Spirit led them, at a time when it was most sorely needed, and when others failed to rise to the opportunity. It is due to their efforts in large measure, that we owe the high spiritual impulses that govern a very large proportion of the American people today.

We are not among those who believe that what the church has lost is irredeemable. It has had a severe lesson, a heavy discipline, a trial as by fire. If its leaders interpret the situation aright, the church will emerge from the ordeal stronger, purer, better equipped than before in its great task of winning the world to Christ. And after the war is over, the sun will shine upon a newly consecrated and glorified church, and men will wonder at the miracle, and be irresistibly drawn by the teaching which lifts up the world's Redeemer, the Prince of Peace, as their Saviour and Friend.

The Staff of Life as a Club

WHETHER or not there is justification for raising the price of bread at this time is a matter now under investigation by the Department of Justice in Washington. In a number of states, the five-cent and ten-cent loaves are being reduced in weight two and four ounces respectively, although still sold at the old prices. In several localities it is planned to supplant the five-cent loaf by a seven-cent loaf, or exclusively by a ten-cent loaf; in others, the five-cent fourteen-ounce loaf has been discontinued in the bakeries and a ten-cent twenty-ounce loaf is sold instead.

Exploiting the public food supply is too serious a matter to be left to the mercy of unscrupulous speculators. Nor is it safe to leave it wholly to the regular trade organizations, for human nature is usually too weak on moral lines to resist the temptation to make money out of the people's needs. Federal interference would be superfluous if each state safeguarded the interests of its own people in this particular respect by wise legislation, properly enforced.

There are evil combinations and good combinations in trade. Any organization to promote efficiency and increase production, and which regulates prices on the basis of a fair profit to the producer and the dealer and a fair price to the consumer, should be encouraged. But the combination which aims at a monopoly of any of the necessaries of life and forces up prices, irrespective of actual trade conditions and simply to extort money from the public, is a menace calling for prompt repression. At the same time, an individual dealer, according to the views held by the Department of Justice, may act independently without becoming amenable to law. It is not unlikely that the whole situation affecting the food supply of the cities may be dealt with in the investigation, including not only bakers' bread but milk, cream, butter, flour, meats and a long list of other daily necessaries. There is no shortage of foodstuffs this year and crops are abundant. Favorable trade conditions have brought prosperity to all kinds of business, the bakers included, and the present attempts to use "the staff of life" as a club for extortion is, as far as we have been able to learn, wholly indefensible.

Lloyd-George in the Spotlight

IT now seems likely that a new turn will be given to the controversy between this government and that of Great Britain over the censorship of the mails. Secretary Lansing lately received the transcript of part of a recent discussion in Parliament, in which Lloyd-George, the British Secretary for War, is quoted as having said in the course of debate that the British government felt at liberty to apply the information gained from the censorship of the mails to any "public or national use." Subsequent to the reception of the transcript, Secretary Lansing received a record of the entire debate, which fully bears out the statements in the transcript.

The question is now raised in an acute form whether or not a government at war does not sacrifice its honor and good faith in upholding the doctrine of one of its leading cabinet ministers that information obtained by forcibly opening the mails of a neutral n be utilized for any other than legitimate belli rent purposes. In other words, can information hich falls into the censor's hands and which may ve a bearing on trade, be peddled out secretly to t advantage of home trade and used to the disadv tage of the neutral concerned without absolute dis nor Is not this precisely what has been done in any cases, following the seizure of American mails. The commerce of our country, at peace with a the belligerents and on equally friendly terms with ach has been materially injured through the abuse the mail of American citizens exclusively for the efit of British trade. Our State Department has p the direct question to the British government in its otes on the subject, which not only deal with th mail censorship but the "black list" of American t ding firms as well. It is a condition for which there s no precedent, and our future course of action will end largely on the tenor of the British answers, hich may be expected in the near future. Secretary oyd-George's surprising statement in Parliament ives added force to the American case, which ji ifies the energetic protests we have made on the s iect.

Set Up the Banners

WHAT would an army be without bann s or badges or uniforms? David, the s lier, exclaimed, "Thou hast given a ban to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed b ause of the truth. . . . And in the name of our G we will set up our banners." "Ye are my witn es," said Jesus. "Ye are the light of the world not merely reflectors, but personal illuminators. our light, shut up under a bushel, needs air. The dle of the Lord goes out unless you display its sl ing. Every Christian soldier should lift up the od-stained banner of the Cross and wave the flag of lory before all mankind.

When one is bold and fearless the battle is hal on. If skeptics and infidels courageously tell of heir unbelief, how much more should we exclaim, "I now in whom I have believed!" If inventors do no ide their discoveries, but tell the world the story of od's power in nature, shall Christians, who have held wonders in the spiritual world far above n ure, padlock their lips and smother the truth as it s in Jesus? A witness can only tell what he knows. The things we have seen and heard and felt, decla we unto you. Paul often fired the columbiad of hi conversion upon his audiences. It was fact on fire, urning into the hearts of men!

Revivals are promoted by each convert lling others of the power of Christ to save, both to in vidual friends and in the public congregation. We m t be witnesses of Christ, of himself personally, of his rds, of his works, of his resurrection and saving p ver, telling the world he is the Way, the Truth an the Life; that there is none other Name whereby hey may be saved. Where there is no witnessing i the church, the glory has departed. Spiritual emp ess cannot testify about God's fulness.

What We Want of Mexico

AS the labors of the Mexican-American oint Commission progress at New London, the eld of its discussion steadily widens. It has een hinted that our military expedition over the b der may be made the basis of a claim for a solati to Mexico for the "humiliation to her sovereignty by what is now termed the "unwarranted invasio of her territory, and also for material damage. No formal proposition looking to an indemnity ha yet come up before the Commission, however, an the much-talked-of loan to enable the Carranza adr istration to carry out its program has not even een hinted at. No matter how deeply Mexico has een hurt in feelings and pocket, her commissioner will preserve a dignified silence on such matters unt the proper time. Meanwhile they are endeavoring to ow that the Carranza government has a much ore extensive territory under control than was gen lly believed. They want to restore confidence ar if possible, to have the warning to American citi ns, which was issued by our government at a cr cal juncture, revoked.

If the Commission takes the broad view o he situation, looking to Mexico's future develop nt and prosperity, as seems probable, it will hardly onsume time in discussing a situation which belon to the past. The real aim should be to plan for the fu re, and especially to do all that lies in its power to re ore confidence and good relations between the wo republics.

Tnnis Champion Defeated

THIS season has seen the final eclipse of "the Comet," Maurice E. McLoughlin, the most remarkable tennis player the wo has ever seen. In 1912 he appea d in the national championship tou ament for the first time and swept all fore him. He had been the undisput champion of the West, and when he et the finest players of the East the proved to be helpless against the bril nce and accuracy of his playing. Wi strokes that were hitherto unknon and a new position of playing in the enter of the court he practically fon d an American school of tennis tha has made our athletes since then wo champions in this form of sport. Ag in 1913 he easily won the national anc ternational events, but gradually oth younger men who had learned fro him began to threaten his laurels, anc his year he was defeated early in the ournament. He then announced tha never again would he compete in the merican classic, for at the early age 26 he finds himself unable to keep pac with the brilliant galaxy of young sta America is developing. His musdes erve and endurance are no longer equ to the task. But with a fine and gen ous spirit he took his defeat, and retid. Contests call out the most that the ody can give, and one to be a victor ust submit to rigorous training anc liscipline. It is only when under per t control that our physical nature ren rs us perfect service. How much mo than the athlete should the Ch tian keep his body fit and pure as a t ple of the Holy Ghost! "Every ma that striveth for the mastery is tem rate in all things. Now they do it to ain a corruptible crown; but we an inc uptible." (I Cor. 9 : 25.)

Substitute for Jute

TE large bags which are used for acking sugar, coffee, grain, cotton anc wool are chiefly made from jute, mo of which comes from India, whose amal exports are said to comprise a bill yards of cloth and over a third of a b on bags. The war has so advanced the rice of this material that search has een made for a more economical sut itute. It has been found in the pla called the Urena lobata, which is ind in warm regions throughout the orld. The fiber is much like that of te, though shorter. In India the pla grows wild; in Madagascar it is foul in great quantities. It is expected tha he plant will be utilized in making oth fabrics than sacking. Grasses and pla s were used in olden times for clo ng, packing and purposes of hu n industry. The papyrus was use for many purposes. Flax was the fav ite plant of the Hebrews. Fabrics we also made from the wool of the she and the thread of the silkworm. Th description of the ideal wife in Pre rbs pictures her making these fab s at her spinning wheel: "She see h wool and flax . . . She layeth her ands to the spindle, and her hands hol he distaff." (Prov. 31 : 13, 19.)

John P. St. John Dead

J IN P. ST. JOHN, a candidate for he presidency on the Prohibition tic t in 1884, twice governor of Kansas, an one of the most widely known ter erance advocates in the United Sta s, died in Olathe, Kan., August 31. He vas born at Brookville, Ind., in 18 , was captain and lieutenant-col el in the Civil War, after which he set d in Kansas. Mr. St. John served as overnor of Kansas from 1879 to 1883, during which time Kansas became a Prohibition state. He took a deep interest in securing prohibitory action. He gives this description of the final passage of the bill. "The silence was intense. We needed one vote to get the necessary two-thirds to carry the proposition through. We did not know how to get it. All at once Mrs. Greaver (the wife of one of the members) started down the aisle to her husband's desk. She stopped before him, and seizing his hand in hers, pleaded with him, 'For my sake, for the sake of your children,' she cried, 'change your vote. Do it for my sake, for my sake, no matter what you believe.' Greaver changed his vote while the building shook with cheers." The earthly life of this man has measured the period of the greatest temperance progress the world has ever known. When John P. St. John left a leading place in the Republican Party to run for the presidency on the third party Prohibition ticket, most people called him a crank, but hatred of rum burned so hotly in his bosom and the necessity for its extinction bore upon him so intensely that he gave up his life to the one work of prohibition. He and a few other pioneers possessed with a great idea woke the nation up and made nation-wide prohibition practicable. It can be said of this hero: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course." (II Tim. 4 : 7.)

Air Line Over Niagara

A SCENIC air route over Niagara Falls is a dream long held by promoting companies and by the public at large, but it had to wait for consummation from a country to which we do not usually look for great progress. Spanish engineers, Spanish patents and Spanish capital made possible the construction of a cableway across the great rapids by which sightseers may swing their way for 1,800 feet across the whirling, seething, plunging waters from one shore to the other. This feat has been accomplished by the Torres Company, which has for several years been successfully operating a similar railway overlooking the Bay of Biscay in Spain. A year ago, after many difficulties of right of way over the Canadian and American parts of the route, the work was begun. First a slender line was carried by land across the cliffs from one terminus to the other several miles below the Falls. Then this was used to draw over a larger cable, and finally the first of the six great parallel woven wire cables was pulled taut and fixed in place, stretching from a concrete base on one side to a series of huge counterweights on the other. By these weights the varying weight of the passenger cars is counterbalanced and the pressure on the cables remains always the same. The passenger car has seats for twenty-four persons, with standing room for twenty-two more. Every possible safety device is attached, and should one or even two cables snap under unusual atmospheric conditions, the car would not fall, but would automatically come to a stop and be towed to land by an emergency engine always kept on hand for that purpose. The line is now finished and in operation. It is the longest, the most interesting scenic line in the world, and its chief importance as a model to American engineers lies in its extreme simplicity. The man who trusts himself to the currents and movements of the life about him and has no uplifting power with which to rise above them finds life wearisome and dangerous, and many a time is swept to death in the whirlpools of selfishness or the madness of a life of vice. Above every temptation, every danger and every difficulty there is an air line where the course is straight and true, the sustaining force adequate and safe and the motor power ample. Those who trust to the unseen power of a living God find the upper pathway to eternal life. "There is none like unto God who rideth upon the heavens for thy help, and in his excellency on the skies. The eternal God is thy dwelling-place, and underneath are the everlasting arms." (Deut. 33 : 26, 27, R. V.)

Soldiers Must Not Swear

GENERAL ZUPELLI, minister of war, has forbidden blasphemy and swearing in the Italian army. His decree provides a severe penalty for its violation. With a language rich enough to express all the flowing beauty of a Dante there is no need for the Italian to resort to oaths to convey his thoughts: with a tongue more ample in its variations than that used by Shakespeare we shall never need to cross the line of reverence and purity in speech. Most oaths are meaningless and their use is a habit which marks one as unacquainted with the richness of his own language. There are whole nations, such as Japan, where this vice is utterly unheard-of and unknown. Christ's rule for us all is simple and direct. "Swear not at all. . . . But let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." (Matt. 5 : 34, 37.)

Kills Weeds by Steam

A NEW farming apparatus has been devised by which steam is injected into the soil and all injurious bugs, worms, larvæ and destructive vegetable growths are killed. It is a large drum-shaped machine with sharp tubes that pierce the ground as it turns and shoot steam into the earth for some distance around. There are early stages where weeds and bad habits can be destroyed by not allowing them to germinate and grow. In order to do this one must go to the roots—the unseen, hidden sources of these things. Under the deed is the hidden intention, the root of action, and this must be good if the life is to be worthy. "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." (Prov. 4 : 23.)

Boy's Dime Starts a Building

TWO years ago by the union of two schools a large vocational institution was founded in Cooperstown, N. Y. At that time the head of the school said in the hearing of a few lads that a fund for a new building would soon have to be started. One of the boys hearing this walked off unnoticed. He went around the neighborhood applying for work until he finally got a job, for which he received a dime. This was dedicated to the new building, and with it as an incentive nearly one hundred thousand dollars has been already given At a recent meeting the story was told, the dime was exhibited in a frame, and a campaign for a building to cost a quarter of a million dollars was launched. All this has grown out of the simple, trustful efforts of the lad of twelve. He got notice and wide commendation, but he did not work for this nor want it. It is the unselfish giving of what little one has that earns Christ's approval. "All they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want did cast in all that she had." (Mark 12 : 44.)

The Pasteboard Rivals

By IDA ALEXANDER

HULDAH LARKIN went about her work in the listless, half-hearted manner of one whose mind was not assisting in the body's tasks. Her face and drooping figure suggested the deepest dejection, but the mouth was set in resolute and bitter lines. When the kitchen was in its accustomed order, she sat down on one of the hard board chairs which it boasted, and rested her head on her hands.

"I s'pose," she said, half aloud, "I'd ought to do the parlor, though the Lord knows I'd ruther die. Still, it's Friday, an' she always done it Fridays."

Presently she arose, went to the darkened parlor and began her unwelcome task. It was not a cheerful place to work in, even when the opened windows threw in a glory of sunshine and sweet-scented air.

From habit her unwilling hands worked thoroughly, and the room of state soon frowned again in spotless cleanliness and forbidding ugliness; all except the mantel. Everything else removable in the room had been taken out before the sweeping, but a thin little layer of dust had collected on the mantel's treasures. As she began gingerly to flick it away, repugnance was added to lassitude; but habit is stronger than either. She took down every article and faithfully dusted them—even the photograph. But that she did not replace. She held it from her, studying it as she had studied it for six months. It was a photograph of a woman in wedding garments—veil, snowy dress and wreath. On the ungloved hand the new ring showed plainly.

As Huldah gazed and gazed, she nervously turned the ring on her own finger, as if she would fain be free of it.

A step sounded on the porch outside. She started violently, hastily hiding the picture.

"Huldy!" said a voice at the open window.

"Oh, Aunt Sallie!" she cried, relief and affection in her voice, "I'm so glad it's you."

"So'm I," responded the other. "I never wanted to be no one else. Come unlatch the screen, an' I'll come in."

The visitor started toward the sitting room, but Huldah pulled her dress.

"Come, set in the parlor, Aunt Sallie. I want to talk to you."

"Been cleanin' the parlor, ain't you?" said Aunt Sallie, after an appreciative glance. "I knew you was when I seen the windows up. But don't overdo, child. Law, that fresh air smells nice. You ought to get out more, Huldy. In the house day an' night ain't good. Where's Joe?"

"He took his lunch today."

"Well, when a man does that, it's a good clear day for workin', or visitin'; but cold lunches ain't jest appetitely."

"N-o-o," assented Huldah, absently.

Then she brought her dark eyes back from their dreams, and looked straight into the gentle blue ones of her visitor.

"Aunt Sallie, do you believe in second marriages?"

Aunt Sallie's hand caressed the little gold band which had once been a wedding ring, as she answered.

"Child, there ain't none can answer that fur another. One thinks this way, one that. We all has to answer some questions fur our own selves. All the love in the world can't step in an' decide no such question."

"I ain't askin' you to decide fur no one. It's—decided already. Do you believe in them, you, yourself?"

"Me, myself? Huldy, if one person loved another, I don't see how the question could come to 'em. But there! There's folks an' folks. We must all go by our own light. But, Huldy, what air second marriages to you? You ain't thinkin' o' makin' one, air you?"

"I made one already. No, I ain't crazy. I been deceivin' you, deceivin' everybody. When I come home, married to Joe, so proud an' happy, an' every one sayin' I done well, I jest couldn't bear to say nothin'. Joe was married before. He was married before, an' he's married now."

"Yes, yes," said the other, soothingly, "o' course he's married now. Don't be excitin' yourself, child, about them as is dead an' gone. It ain't many as has a man's first love. An' the last's a better an' more endurin' thing."

"I ain't had that. I ain't had his first love, or his last. He loves that—that woman."

"Now, Huldy, that air nonsense. Why——"

"It's the gospel truth. Look!"

WITH a sudden movement she drew forth the picture. "Aunt Sallie, don't you think that woman was a sneak? I been studyin' her in cold blood an' in hot, an' every time I thought the same."

She waited breathlessly while Aunt Sallie adjusted her glasses and looked at the photograph.

"Don't you think so?" she asked after waiting for the other to speak. "Oh Aunt Sallie, don't you?"

"Them as is dead is helpless—helplesser than a baby. Neither you nor me would be hittin' a little child as couldn't hit back. Onkind thoughts of the dead is bad; onkind words is worse. But, Huldy, I'll tell you this much: Ef I had a son an' he was goin' to marry a woman as looked like her—though she's likely lookin' in a way—I'd do my level best to purvent him. Now don't be worryin' an' jealous any more. You're all of a tremble."

"I think I'll die an' I hope so, too," sobbed Huldah, suddenly putting her head in the other's lap. "Yes, I do. I wish I was dead every day. Oh, you don't know what it is. You can't know, fur I never told you an' no one else ever had the same thing to bear. Every day it's that woman. Ef I cook anything, she done it better; ef I've a pretty dress on, she had prettier. She was perfect. Everything she done was right. An' the pictures—that's the worst of all. He's this one here an' another one like it in the bedroom. I wanted him to put them away, an' he says, 'She was a good wife to me, an' I won't put them away like I furgot her.' I says, 'You'd ought to have furgot her before you married me.' We had some words. We're always havin' 'em. I wish to God I could die like she done, an' mebbe he'd find some good in me then."

So prone
Was he to find
Some good in all Mankind;

So quick
To stop and heed
The cry of those In need;

And so Disposed to say Nothing to mar
One's day,

That heaven,
With love abrim,
Did not seem strange
To him.

Aunt Sallie, who was aunt to half of Jobtown, and kin to none, passed her hand caressingly over the dark, tumbled hair.

"No, you don't want to die, Huldy, an' you ain't a-goin' to, till the measure o' days God has laid out fur you is done. Besides, you ain't fit to, until all them oncharitable thoughts is done away with; an' then you won't want to. So there you air. Now we must think how to mend this trouble, fur it kin be mended. Huldy, death is the only trouble there ain't no cure fur. An' God has one stored up even fur that, that we'll know some day. Now, git yore hat an' walk a piece with me, an' we'll talk about this as we go."

TWILIGHT had fallen before Joe came over the hill, whistling, in high good humor. Huldah was not at the gate nor the door.

"Sulkin', I suppose," he said to himself, impatiently.

But it was not a sullen face that turned toward him as he pushed open the door of the dining-room. Some subtle change had fallen on it—a touch of gravity, a flickering light of peace. Rebellion had faded from the unsmiling eyes; her lips trembled at his kiss.

"What's the matter, Huldy? Heard bad news?"

"No. No, Joe."

"Then what air it? I never seed you so quiet."

"I'll tell you when you've et. But, indeed, 'tain't nothin'—leastways, nothin' that kin be helped."

At last the silent meal was over, the dishes washed and put away. Joe waited curious and expectant.

"Well, out with it, little woman," he said, as Huldah sat down opposite him.

"Joe, there's some things hard to tell, an' hard to bear. But if you will, you will. Come in the parlor."

"The parlor?" he echoed.

"Yes," she answered, lighting a lamp and leading the way.

Joe's eyes turned first, as they always did, to the picture on the mantel, but this time they did not linger. He strode to the mantel and took up a photograph that stood beside the other one.

"Who's this?" he demanded angrily.

"Ah, be keerful, Joe," said Huldah, putting down the lamp and taking the picture from his hand. "A hurt to that picture's a hurt to me. It mustn't be handled rough."

"Who is it?" he said again.

"Set down, Joe. It's—it's a anniversary today. I—I thought I'd put this picture by the other one. You know you said yourself that it looks like you furgot any one, when little things like that is put away. An' I never furgot him. But I ain't thought o' him in years like I done today. It all come back to me."

"Who is he?" Joe repeated through his clenched teeth.

"Didn't I tell you, Joe? Didn't I never tell you about my own sweetheart as was killed in the war? It was—afore I met you that I knowed him an' loved him. I've often thought of what you say, Joe, about that there can't be but one real love in a person's life. Others is shams."

"Wimmen is pretty good at makin' the sham seem real. If you loved him, why did you marry me?"

Huldah studied the picture lying on her knees. "Why did I? Because you asked me, dear Joe. What did you ask me for, seein' you loved her?"

Aunt Sallie gasped.

“Open shame on you fur sayin' it, even to yourself. No man ever had a better or a sweeter wife. Why God didn't take the little grievin', heart-sick thing tonight, I don't know. But his ways is hard for us to onderstand.”

“A mistake,” he repeated, as if she had not spoken, “in not tryin' to win Huldy's love from that—that jackanapes. I never suspected there was any one till she tole me. A fellow like that! He don't look as if he had his right sense. Aunt Sallie, war he so good, or war he jest too simple to be anything else?”

“He war a good man—a better man than you be, Joe Larkin. He died young, with no blot on character or soul. Come away now, to see Huldy. P'raps some day she might tell you more'n I done about poor Willie.”

“I don't want her to tell me nothin', or to mention his name to me, ever, so long as we both live. I been in misery enough about him. Night an' day, day an' night, all these months he's been torturin' me. He's settin' at the table between us; he's peerin' in at the window, mockin' at the man who tried to steal his gal, an' couldn't. Likely he's up there now, lookin' at my child with his searchin' dead eyes.”

“Well, ef people kin come back—I always misbelieved it—but ef they kin, what'd be more natural than fur him to want to be nigh that pore little thing, whose own husband don't love her?”

“Love her!” cried Joe, in sudden passion, “ef he'd hev loved her a tenth as well as I done, he couldn't hev died. I ain't hardly ever slept sense she tole me about him, tryin' to think out a way to make her love me, an' furgit him. I don't know whether I'm jealous, or what, but somethin' burns—burns worser'n hell fire.”

Aunt Sallie laughed.

“Joe, I ain't the one to tell you, an' this ain't the time, but Huldy has somethin' she'll tell you some day, as will relieve that worryin' mind o' yourn.”

He caught her hands in a strong grip, but his voice was like that of a little child.

“Aunt Sallie, tell me now!”

“Lor, I s'pose I might as well, or I'll hev you up there botherin' that little mother. I'm to blame, Joe, remember that; an' I don't know as I hev much to say in excuse. Only, I loved Huldy sense she war no bigger'n that small son o' yourn. So when I come in a few months ago, an' she told me she wished she was dead; I tried to think of a way to change that wish. An' I did. I give her somethin' to think of as would stop her frettin'. Frettin's deadly. An' it's turned out as good as I dared to hope. I'm an old woman as has seen many things—troubles a-plenty of my own, an' other people. An' I knowed this much—the thing which is ours, beyond fear o' loss, is often less vallible in our eyes than it ought to be, an' a lost thing sometimes more. So, when Huldy cried an' cried about you leavin' yore dead wife's picture before her, I jest up an' put her in mind o' Willie Morrow, her first sweetheart, the only one she ever had before you. Don't scowl like that, Joe. It war when she war in pinafores, with thick black pigtails hangin' down her back. I don't suppose she war more'n seven, an' she never seen him after. It war about that time her ma died, an' she left Jobtown to live at that aunt's where you met her. Poor Willie was one of the first to go to fight them pesky Spaniards, an' they killed him. So, man, you been jealous o' a picture—one sent to me, at that. For that matter, it war a picture caused all o' Huldy's misery.”

“Yes,” he answered, soberly, “jest a picture. I been seein' that the last four months. It's only a picture to me, but Huldy's the livin', breathin' woman as I love. . . . Come! I want to see my wife and my child.”

Hot Springs of Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

HOT springs in Alaska! Boiling water bubbling out of the beds of glaciers! Steam rising from the earth on the edge of prehistoric ice several hundred feet deep! Sea bathing in natural water almost on the edge of the north pole! These are some of the wonders of our great territory whose shores are washed by the Arctic Ocean and Bering Sea.

I have heard of hot springs ever since I came to Alaska. They are to be found from the islands at the southeastern part of the territory to the very shores of the Arctic. Fifty miles north of Ketchikan, the first port at which the steamers stop, are the Belle Island hot springs, where the water is 164 degrees Fahrenheit, or hot enough to cook eggs. A little farther north are the Sitka hot springs, which are 156 degrees above zero, and, on Chichagof Island, between Sitka and Juneau, are the Tenakee hot springs, where the postmaster is building cottages and trying to make the place a summer and winter resort. The Tenakee springs are in a natural forest, and the forestry service is putting in board walks and other improvements.

As I traveled north through the islands of southeastern Alaska I met Mr. F. Waring, one of the geological survey experts, who has come north this summer to investigate some of the hot springs of the territory. He has already visited many and is now testing them here on the Tanana River. We have together explored the Baker hot springs, of which I write at length further on.

Mr. Waring tells me that the geological survey has discovered many hot springs in different parts of Alaska. There is one northwest of Belle Island, known as the Bailey hot springs. The water there is close to boiling, and one of the springs is an incipient geyser, which spurts to a height of fifty inches or more. Its temperature is 191 degrees Fahrenheit. On the east side of Baranof Island is Warm Springs Bay, where the government is now considering laying out a town with the idea that it may be a resort. They have surveyed the land about the springs and are putting in cottages and boardwalks over the muskeg. The springs belong to the forest reserve. There are nine of them flowing out of the side of a hill almost on the edge of the sea. The water is now piped into wooden bathhouses in which there are bathtubs of wood.

A little north of Cape Edward, on the ocean side of Chichagof, are the Hoona warm springs, which are right on the sea, only ten or fifteen feet from high tide; and there are other springs on the islands close to the ocean. I do not know that you can catch fish in the ocean and by giving a twist of your line drop them into the springs to be cooked; but the springs are so close to the water that it would seem to be possible. There are fish everywhere about the warm springs of the islands, and fine crabs and clams where the fresh waters flow into Tenakee Inlet. About all of these springs are deer and other wild game, including bear, black and brown, which one is not prohibited from killing.

THE Baker Hot Springs lie on the Tanana River about twelve hours by steamer from where it flows into the Yukon. They are on the winter trail from Fairbanks to Tanana, and are just about 100 miles across country from the northern terminus of the railway Uncle Sam is now building. They lie about three miles from the banks of the Tanana River, and upon landing I was able to get a hay wagon to carry me across to the town near the springs.

Nearing the town we drove over a corduroy bridge, crossing a creek that flows into the Tanana, and stopped at the post office, which is a wire cage inside a galvanized iron store building belonging to the Northern Commercial Company. Not far from the post office were the ruins of a hotel which was a winter and summer resort until it was burned a short time ago. The hotel had great bathing and swimming tanks and its ruins show that it was of considerable extent. It was built of logs and cost, it is said, more than $40,000. Today there is only one bathing tank left. This is covered by a cabin, and the water inside is brought through an iron pipe from the springs which flow out of the hills about a half mile away. I tested the bath with a thermometer and it was just 114 degrees Fahrenheit. It was hot enough to paint my skin scarlet when I jumped in.

Coming to the steaming brook that flows from the spring we passed a chicken and hog shed about 400 feet in length. It is vacant now from the burning of the hotel, but when business was booming its owner kept there 650 hens, fifty ducks and seventy pigs. He had also twenty-five horses and eight cows and a bull. The sheds were cut out of the hill from which the spring comes. The ground is so hot that it kept the poultry and other stock in comfort throughout the winter, and that without the stoves necessary to other parts of Alaska.

The water changes the temperature of the land of almost the whole farm. The adjacent hill slopes are a natural hotbed. Snow falling on the warm ground thaws so rapidly that the surface is seldom white for more than a ocuple of days at a time, and the frost goes down only an inch or so. On the edge of the warm land young parsnips have been dug in March from under the snow, and all other crops are much in advance of those planted farther away. When the hotel was running, five acres were devoted to vegetables, chiefly turnips, lettuce, cabbage and carrots, and thirty-two were planted in potatoes, the yield being seven or eight tons to the acre.

The author with one hand in a hot stream, the other in icy water

A little beyond the big chicken coop I stopped at the foot of a hill where the springs are. The warm water flows out at the rate of 150 gallons to the minute. It is as clear as crystal, but it is steaming, and that at a temperature of 125 degrees Fahrenheit. I watched Mr. Waring, the hot springs expert, as he tested the heat and measured the flow. He says it is hot enough to soft-boil eggs in ten minutes.

Walking down the stream thirty or forty feet, I found another brook flowing into it, and supposed this would be of about the same temperature as the one we had tested. I put in my hand. The water was icy cold. The junction of the two streams was such that I was able to stand on the fork and put one hand in the hot water and the other in the cold.

During my stay in Alaska I have met G. D. Schofield of Seattle, the owner of some of the largest springs on the Seward Peninsula. These are more wonderful than the springs here. They are situated about seventy miles north of Nome, at the foot of the Saw-Tooth Mountains, just about fifty feet above sea level. There are a number of them which boil out of the ground at a temperature of 160 degrees Fahrenheit, maintaining the same heat winter and summer. The springs form a stream called Hot Creek, which runs through a farm of 320 acres; and the heat so affects the temperature of the land that a great part of it is cultivated. In my talk with Mr. Schofield I asked him as to his farm at the springs. He replied:

“We have forty acres under cultivation, and sixty more that could be put into crops. The whole of this hundred acres is kept warm by the springs and the hot water under the ground. If you dig down anywhere inside this tract you will find hot earth, and the lower you go the hotter it gets. At a depth of six feet you cannot hold the earth in your hands. There seems to be a stratum of hot water under the whole hundred acres. On the other hand the land outside that area is frozen solid to a depth the extent of which no one knows. It is a vat of hot water or rather hot earth in a basin of ice.

“We have a glass greenhouse, thirty-six feet long and sixteen feet wide, built above one of the hot springs. The hot water furnishes the heat, and no matter if the thermometer goes to thirty degrees below zero outside, it never gets to freezing within. The plants grow in the hothouse all winter and in the summer we have cucumbers, tomatoes and watermelons. We also raise lettuce, young onions and other green stuff. We have a tree onion that grows well. It does not lie in the ground, but grows on the branches of a tree, twelve or fourteen inches high.”

I rode all day long on the Tanana River in coming from Fort Gibbon to the Baker Hot Springs.

The river is sluggish and it carries down a vast deal of silt. The water is as thick as bean soup, and a glass of it, allowed to settle, will soon hide the bottom of the tumbler. In places the river is from five to ten miles in width. It is shallow, and it is always building up and tearing down the valley through which it flows.

As you ride along in the steamer you can see the banks crumbling. The water melts the icy stratum under the soil, and trees, bushes and the earth in which they are growing fall down into the current under your eyes. The river banks are lined with trees still living and still green, which have fallen this way into the current. At times the water so melts the frozen strata that caves are formed under the matted moss, and where there is an open space and no trees this green mat falls down into the stream, hanging from above as though it were a great green carpet laid from the bed of the river up to the shore.

Family Trees With Good Roots

By REMINGTON SCHUYLER

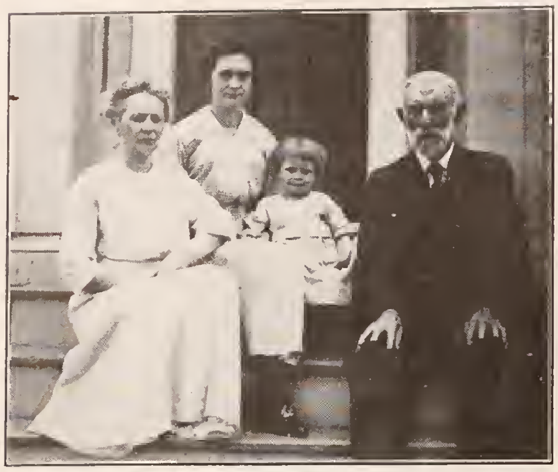
TO me, a "home" means more than just a building or a set of rooms. I have been in some wonderfully expensive houses, but they weren't homes. They had servants, and they had three meals a day, and regular furniture just as homes should have; but they were as far from being real homes as icebergs are from being cozy ingle-nooks.

Some people think that when they acquire a fireplace they have achieved a home. It takes more than a fireplace. It takes loving hearts; it takes mutual consideration; it takes generous forbearance and unselfishness to make a real home. Then a fireplace neither mars nor makes the peace of the home. (Though between you and me I find that my own ingle-nook fireplace uses three times the wood a stove does, and besides, my back is never really warm.)

You know I really don't blame Horatio Coe for boarding up the large, old-fashioned fireplace, and putting in a plain matter-of-fact furnace. Of course, though, visitors certainly do like to see that fine black yawning mouth of an old-fashioned fireplace. There's nothing like a fireplace full of a lot of useless long-handled skillets and pot-hooks to convince total strangers that you once had a grandfather. In fact, it's better than showing them your family tree. There's a certain substantial bulkiness about an old fireplace, especially if it has a "Dutch oven," that simply overwhelms a visitor.



Great-grandfather Charles Johnson, grandmother (Mrs. Emma Woodard) Johnson and her daughter, Mrs. Jennie Johnson Harrington, and baby Harrington

The modern dairy barn of a family that believes that quality will tell

I have known some people whose only proof that they had ancestors was the fact that they had bought somebody else's ancestral fireplace.

This Coe family I'm telling about were pioneers in this valley of the Sugar River near Talcottville in Lewis County, New York. A man named William Topping was the first settler in this neighborhood. He came into the wilderness in 1794. You see, he was just six years ahead of the ancestor of this man Horatio Coe.

Now, when I say "the first settler," let us picture for a moment just what that meant. This man William Topping was just thirty-two years old. He had a wife, a son of seven, and a little girl of five. He had an ox team, and on the ox cart he carried all his household goods. Everything he possessed was on that load. We can imagine the little girl and boy jolting along through the primeval forests. The dim light that filtered through the thick branches, far overhead. We can imagine the Indians, both real and imaginary, they saw lurking in the shadowy depths of those mighty trees. History states that Topping's wife drove the ox cart, while he went forward, ax in hand, to clear a wide path. History states also that after leaving Meriden, Connecticut, they were two weeks in reaching Whitestown. It states also that finally they turned north into the wilderness, pursuing their course through underbrush and around fallen logs.

Just consider all the hardships they endured as they pushed out into the trackless and almost endless woods. Finally they arrived at a river that had no name. Later it became known as Sugar River, because tradition recounts that one day while crossing a wide bridge he had constructed, and bearing on his shoulder yoke two pails of maple syrup, this paragon of a Topping slipped and fell into the river with his load of sweets.

It was April, late April, when they reached this place which was to be home. William set to work and constructed a wide hut. Beside the massive trunk of a fallen forest monarch he pieced together a bark shanty. The side walls were poles and a blanket served as door.

April passed, and May. Then, with June, Jared Topping arrived. The two brothers set to work, and log by log there rose the pioneer home, a rough log cabin. As this neared completion, there came into the wooded valley other pioneers—men who had followed the blazed trail of this original settler. Their names, Asa Lord, William Dustin, Bela Butterfield, smack of other days. And these hardy men set to work to fashion homes.

Yet, when winter came, of this number William Topping and Bela Butterfield alone dared the rigors of winter and remained.

Two years later Brainard Coe settled here. Another two years and the saw-mill which they had built was turning out rough boards. In 'ninety-eight David B. Miller built a barn. It was a "framed" building of rough-hewn timbers and roug aw boards. This still stands today, a testimony f th care and thoroughness of those ancient builde

Now we come to the forefather of this Coe mi —Joel Coe. He came into the country in e ite hundred, just six years after Topping. Of our those six years of homesteading hadn't done n ch the forests which crowded in on every side. o w can count Joel Coe as a pioneer.

He looked the ground over. There is still a nke trail that crosses several of the pastures. W re crosses soggy places you can see old half-p ifie logs, the remains of that ancient French and dia trail. Yes, the way is quite marked in plac winds on over the hills, and you can see i qui clearly where it crests the sandy dunes near Bo vill Joel Coe seemed to think that a hotel or taverr oul be a good thing to operate along this rough ooc road, which wriggled out of the wilderness to t ea and disappeared into the gloomy woods to th ves The tavern was on the hillside, a few hundrec are above Sugar River. The descendants of his son este have a quaint old flask bottle. They say it w on of the kind that, filled with something othe tha water, was sold in the little log tavern to stray I nel men and trappers.

Today the tavern is no more. On its site now ands the comfortable home of Almerion Coe, the reat-grandson of Joel Coe.

I visited the pleasant family of Almerion C one Sunday afternoon. They were getting ready t o to "meeting." Yet they set out for me a truly oble repast when they found I had not had any ner. Also they looked up much of the data conc ning Topping and the other pioneers.

I find in looking over the foregoing I haven told you much about Horatio Coe's home or nily. Horatio Coe is a fine young man just sevent four years old. I say "young" with care. He ha been "breaking" a horse all that morning. Beca e of my cowboy youth he might have hired me to vork with him, only I made a bad mistake at dinner

It was all Horatio's wife's fault. You see, I ived at the Coe place at twelve noon. This wasn't tentional. On my trip I used to visit around a day long, and I was bound to arrive at some farn ouse at noon. Just as sometimes when I rode and ited till eight in the evening, I was und to arrive at some farmhouse j t at supper time.

Well, I went up to the doc and knocked. It was a beautifu old-fashioned, long-paneled door, s just two feet deep in a beautifu old-fashioned stone wall. It was th kind of old-fashioned wall that coulc have withstood old-fashioned artille or Indians for quite a spell. The H atio Coe house is one of those old-fas ned kind that Washington generally ked out for headquarters. The Johnson Homestead

T twenty years after Topping tled on Sugar River, George ngton Johnson left Dutchess y and came north. In coming he must have passed right by Coe's tavern, for that seems to een the only trail up that way. ust have passed Topping's place, He followed the old French cor- road up through the woods along lack River. Where Mill Creek s into the Black River, he turned vesterly, and near the headwaters l Creek he settled. He was thirty- years old. He was married. His name was Mercy Bailey. Their was a wide log cabin.

T second summer was that curious f 1816. This was the year when was frost every month during the er. In June they had a heavy torm. Nothing ripened.

n a long trying illness left this George Johnson, a cripple. His ad stiffened, so he could not bend ists. And yet day after day, in urious manner, he chopped wood id his chores. He used to chop rds of three-foot wood every day. ardy old fellow, George, wasn't to be incapacitated. He was ingenious. He learned to make baskets, and part of the year, little tin trunk thrown over his lers, he went about peddling es and oils and extracts.

lived to be seventy-seven years d was active and useful up to the Just eleven years before George his son Dennis married Jane Gal- . When Dennis was married, he the little farm, which had now to forty-five acres. His parents with him.

nis acquired shortly afterward y acres. This piece was so thickly rown with thistles that the first he raised no crops on it. He plowed and replowed all that er until he had exterminated the crop. On his other acres he hay. For Dennis was convinced hat country was especially adapted irying. On the hay he cut he red one cow and seven calves.

an experiment he took over thirty of woodland. In this patch there "sugar bush of a hundred maple trees." He used to go there in the early fall and take in the kettles and pails and all the necessary things for making sugar. In the winter, when the heavy snows made it impossible to get to the "bush" with wagons, he would snowshoe it in over the drifts. In some springs they cleaned up over five hundred pounds of sugar.

But in time he sold this woodland, and bought another thirty acres of sparse woodland and pasture. For he was keen about that dairy farm.

On this pasture there was a deep gulch, and in this gulch peppermint seemed to grow in profusion. So Dennis finally decided as a sideline to distil peppermint oil. On each acre they raised enough peppermint to distil an average of twenty-two pounds. For this oil of peppermint he received three dollars and a half per pound. The old peppermint still was in the gulch. Dennis's son, Charles Johnson, now a man of seventy-four, gave me most of this information. At six years of age he can remember his father running the peppermint still. This was in eighteen forty-eight. This peppermint business was the first "easy" money the Johnson family had ever made. In fact, it was the nucleus of their ultimate dairy farm.

So, as the family grew and prospered, we find them spreading out both in barns and houses. In time, the log house was abandoned and a framed house built just west of where the present home now stands. The present house, which shines in a new coat of white paint, was built in 'fifty-seven. The timber in it was all cut down on the creek. All the boards were got out with a cross-cut saw. Two thousand feet a day was the average sawing. Today Charles Johnson's son, George Washington Johnson, lives on the farm.

Right here I may state that always the Johnsons believed that good care was necessary to get good results. As an example: The Johnsons averaged two hundred pounds of butter a year from each cow. Two of their neighbors, who couldn't figure, once brought their accounts to the Johnsons to have them added up. These accounts showed that their neighbors were getting only an average of one hundred pounds and one hundred and twenty-five pounds per cow per year. It wasn't the cow's fault. It was the lack of care. For when the neighbors said that the Johnson stock was superior stock, what do you think old Dennis Johnson did? Why, he bought one of their neighbor's cows—one of the scrubbiest, least productive kind. In a year it had become a two-hundred-pound-a-year cow.

Yes, quality tells, but, all things being equal, it's the care and the love and attention we bestow on our jobs that make them yield large instead of just average.

Church Advertising Convention

THE pastors of the Congregational, Methodist, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Universalist and Jewish churches of New Haven are behind a movement to promote systematic church advertising. It has been decided to invite ministers, laymen, heads of men's clubs, superintendents of Sunday schools, et cetera, to New Haven for the purpose of attending a convention, October 8-10. The New Haven Publicity Club of the Chamber of Commerce will have charge, and a large and enthusiastic committee of business men has been appointed. Ministers and interested churchmen are invited to attend from all nearby states. Prominent advertising men and ministers of this country will give addresses, including Harry Tipper, advertising manager of the Texas Company, New York; Llewelyn E. Pratt, Chairman of the Educational Department of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World; John Lee Mahin, New York; Rev. D. E. Weigle, Philadelphia; Rev. Charles Stelzle, New York; Carl Hunt; Professor Paul T. Cherrington, of Harvard; Rev. Christian F. Reisner, Grace Methodist Church, New York City; William Shaw, of Boston, General Secretary, Christian Endeavor. Any one interested in Church Publicity is invited to attend.

The Mitchell Sedan, Springfield Type—Seats for Seven

How Car Ideas Are Changing

Now It's One Car for All Weathers

In motor cars ideas are changing, as they did in trolley cars. In summer we used to have open street cars, which were curtained when it rained. Now the same cars are used in summer and winter—cars in which windows drop.

In the Touring Sedan—the Springfield type—this idea is applied to motor cars. And the demand for this type is sensational.

This is a luxury car—a superb Sedan—with the plate-glass windows up. It has seats for seven—all in one compartment. So the lady can drive, if she wishes.

In a moment all windows disappear. All sashes and braces with them. And you have a Touring Car. It doesn't matter what the weather is when you have a car like this.

In the Cabriolet—a closed Coupe—the windows drop and the top falls back. Then you have an open Roadster.

Luxury's Last Word

Mitchell designers, under John W. Bate, have just completed five new types of closed bodies. They were designed for the January Shows—as the Mitchell models bodies. But we are building 500 to be sold this fall, to add to the Mitchell prestige.

Our artists and designers, before completing these models, examined 257 of the latest designs, European and American. So all the new luxuries, all the new touches, are combined in this single car.

You will find in these new Mitchells at least 20 attractions which no other one car embodies. You will find the best examples of superb body building that were ever put on show.

On a Lifetime Chassis

These bodies come mounted on a Bate-built chassis—in which John W. Bate has made 700 improvements. Every part has at least 50 per cent over-strength. Every major strain is met with Chrome-Vanadium steel. And 440 parts are either drop-forged or steel-stamped.

This car typifies efficiency, carried to the limit. It has 26 extras which other cars omit. It offers at least 20 per cent greater value than any other car in this class. All these extras are paid for by factory savings.

See these new bodies at your local Mitchell showroom before the allotment is sold. We can build only 500 of them this fall, because of the trebled demand for our open cars.

Paul Before Felix

International Sunday School Lesson for October 8. Acts 24

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Herein I also exercise myself to have a conscience void of offense." Acts 24 : 16.

Conscience is the throne of divine judgment in every breast. It has nothing to say as to the expediency or inexpediency, the prudence or imprudence of a proposed course: but directly rightness or wrongness is in question, it arises and pronounces its verdict. Against that verdict there is no appeal. The figures on the dials of certain specially constructed clocks are made of a phosphorescent substance which absorbs the sunlight and emits it in the dark, so that you can read the hour at midnight without striking a match. But it is necessary to expose the clock-face to absorb the sunshine, if it is to serve you effectively in the night. So conscience needs to be bathed in the light of God's truth, to be saturated by it, to be adjusted by it. The watch in your pocket requires to be synchronized by standard time, and conscience should be compared with the teachings of God's Word.

Felix Before Paul?

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

ONE more court-room scene—they were becoming familiar enough to Paul, thanks to the relentlessness of his opponents. They went sixty-five or seventy miles out of their way, from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, to follow up their persecution of the man who had made their previous attempts ridiculous. But Ananias the high priest had a personal grudge against the apostle who had likened him to a whited sepulcher. The array of Jewish leaders kept to the background this time and tried to make out a civil case against Paul as seditious, a disturber of the peace, and a defiler of the temple, which had been granted civil protection by Roman law. A Roman lawyer named Tertullus had been engaged, probably selected for his skill and reputation at the governor's court. It made the issue more prejudicial to Paul to have a man more or less neutral in the religious controversy to handle the case.

Flattery

IT was the custom of the times to open a legal plea with compliments to the judge—in fact, it is usually done today—but Tertullus went far beyond the reasonable conciliation of the ignoble Felix. It was gross flattery. The great historian Tacitus gives an evil report of both Felix and his brother Pallas, a notorious character at Rome. Professor Bartlett of Oxford calls him the worst of the series of unsuitable procurators who led to the final revolt of the Jews in A.D. 66. This is the man of whom Tertullus says, "We owe it to your foresight that this nation is constantly securing reforms."

Toadying to the influential is demoralizing to both parties. It lowers the self-respect and impairs the sincerity of the suppliant and it distorts the perspective of the man of authority. How can a born king get a correct view of the place he occupies in the world? What he hears from childhood is modulated for his ears. Then, too, flattery always tends to make politeness superficial instead of genuine consideration. It leads to suspicion of motive on the part of any thoughtful mind. It is altogether possible that Felix smiled grimly to himself as Tertullus spoke and wondered as to the underlying causes of the visit of the priests to the ruler they hated and disowned.

Half-Truths

THE charge against Paul may be reduced to three counts, each of which had a shadow of the truth upon it. First he was said to be a dangerous character, who stirred up the Jews to insurrection wherever he went. Now the one great contribution of the Romans was peace—the pax Romana—and all disorders were repressed with a heavy hand even by such rascals as Procurator Felix. The governor might not care at all for a theological dispute, but he was certain to be harsh on revolutionists and disturbers. This charge might hurt the defense, because tidings may have reached Cæsarea of the riots in Corinth and Ephesus and other places where Paul had worked. It would not avail that he had avoided discord even to the extent of withdrawing from town after town because of the fury of the Jews. "Only the bad is carried by rumors." On a previous occasion it had been said, "These that have turned the world upside down have come hither also."

Second, Paul is a religious sectary, a nonconformist, a heretic. This was far worse in the eyes of the priests, but it is hard to see what bearing it would have in a civil court. Possibly Tertullus thought it made the case more imposing. A large measure of support was given to the established religion in each Roman province. But hardly to the suppression of sects and the decision of theological scruples.

Third, Paul is accused of sacrilege, profaning the temple. This was a serious offense against Roman law, and such temples as that at Jerusalem had been taken over and were protected in their peculiar rites and prohibitions. This charge was the mere unproved assumption of the real inciter of the riot a day or two before. Paul had disposed of it to the satisfaction of Lysias the commander easily enough. It is likely that Tertullus believed it true, and it gave a strong touch to the indictment for disturbing the Roman peace upon which he chiefly relied.

Half-truths! They have been called the most dangerous lies. Perhaps, rather, they are the most customary. They ease the conscience of the perpetrator and accomplish his purpose just as effectively. How much malicious gossip and tale-bearing is of this order! The things said are almost true, but the things left unsaid would explain and illuminate the matter with the other half of the truth. Hence the court-room oath, "The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." There are so many times when one does not know the whole truth and it is best to keep silent. On the other hand, as Bulwer Lytton put it, "Plain truth is one of the sublimest things in the world," and it is good to hear. There is so much white-lying, so much falsification in the world nowadays. At the bar of public opinion in the state at large or among our own friends we should offer no testimony of things half-true.

O God of Truth for whom we long,
Thou who wilt hear our prayer,
Do thine own battle in our hearts,
And slay all falsehood there.

The unfortunate thing about many legal activities is that half-truth becomes the whole machinery of attack and defense. Not justice but victory is sought. The case, not the truth, is the all-important factor. It is almost disheartening to see and hear at a trial the sparring and fencing by which it is hoped to conceal the unfavorable aspects of a case if possible.

In this instance the misrepresentation continued to the end of the plaintiff's evidence. Tertullus said that Paul was arrested by the priests, when he was actually mobbed by the rabble. He declares, further (according to verse 7), that Lysias wrongfully took the prisoner from the Jewish authorities, when he had really rescued a Roman citizen from lynching by a crowd of fanatics. To cap the climax, the prominent leaders from Jerusalem took oath that these things were true. It must have seemed like a formidable indictment to Felix. There are "two sides to a story," however. When we listen to one only it sometimes seems incredible that the other could make any change in our opinion. Yet if we are even as fair as a Roman court, we will never render judgment without hearing both sides. Very often indeed would our sympathy be transferred. Be fair.

Tactfulness and Sincerity

PAUL contrasts tact with flattery by his opening words. He finds the best true thing applicable to the case in hand that he can say to conciliate the governor. Courtesy is always desirable, and the courteous heart can always find fact to justify kindness. It was a good reason for confidence that Felix had been many years a judge of the nation, for he must have learned the true nature of much of their turbulence before this. Paul's whole attitude was at once sincere and winsome. He is trying to help the ruler to visualize the exact facts.

He had only been twelve days in Jerusalem, had gone there to worship and not to preach. As far as the charge of trouble-making went, it was utterly false. He had not even spoken or argued in a synagogue, in the temple or on the streets. The Jews had "stirred up" the whole matter, and could not offer any proof to the contrary. On the second point Paul declares the charge has no standing in the court at all. He is a Nazarene, as they call it; what of it? He worships God, the same God as they; he has the same Scriptures, which he believes; and the same hope of the future. He is thoroughly conscientious in the matter, though some phases of his interpretation they call heresy. But the Roman law had no jurisdiction nor interest in such details. On the third count, far from defiling the temple he had come with alms for the poor among its worshipers from far countries, and had taken seven days to undergo the severest ritual of its worship. If the facts were otherwise, where were their witnesses? Not only was this the case, but he had had one trial and no valid evidence had been offered against him.

It was a straightforward refutation of all that had been brought against him. It is a model still of directness, legal accuracy and good penetrating sense. Yet it is not harsh nor calculated to give offense to any one. A model for the Christian who is obliged to give an account of himself! Tact with absolute fidelity to truth—here is our standard in public and in private affairs. There is a belligerent and harsh truth-telling that sometimes prides itself as stalwart Christian character. But the perfect is never unseasoned with kindness.

"Which They Call Heresy"

ONE is reminded of the old saying, "Orthodoxy is my doxy, heresy is your doxy." They called Christianity heresy. What a clamor of voices calling "heresy!" the Christian world itself has suffered! Each denomination used to be a standing denunciation of some other. To the Catholic the Episcopalian was a heretic and no more. To the Episcopalian the Baptist was a heretic and little more. Thanks be to God that we are coming fast into days when men of good will shall no longer bandy epithets and cry "heresy!" but shall recognize the gracious fact that every great historic body of Christians has had some vital contribution to make, has increased the whole wealth of truth and life. Intolerance is not acceptable to God. Remember the words of Jesus when John told him of the unknown religious healer whom the disciples had tried to silence (Luke 9): "Forbid him not. He that is not against us is for us."

Let us hope that the days of heresy trials are gone. Let us all be charitable and remember that it is not necessary that we should all agree with one another, but it is supremely needful that we should love one another; not to think alike, but to serve together. All the great saints and reformers have been called heretics by some one. We must not be judges of God's servants—to their own Master they stand or fall. It is odious and unbrotherly to affix obnoxious labels. In all schools of thought and shades of theological belief are found strong servants of the living God. "Ask for the old paths" and "Behold, a new thing will I do" are equally Scriptural and essential to the progress of the Kingdom.

A Deferred Decision

THE case of Tertullus had been smashed to pieces. Instead of discharging the prisoner or seeking further witnesses Felix deferred his decision. Probably he wanted to avoid giving offense to the most influential group of men in his district. So Ananias "saved his face" but went back disappointed and raging. It seems credible that already the thought of a possible bribe came into the mind of Felix. He had little intention of really hearing Lysias. Yet Paul was given a measure of liberty and the ministry of Luke and Philip and other Christians. Two years of comparative rest resulted, and in the providence of God Paul was preparing for the last phase of his earthly career. But think of the baseness of a mind that could be impressed by the innocence and greatness of a prisoner and yet keep him in bonds to conciliate politicians.

Felix Terrified

AS Luke says, Felix had a very fair knowledge of Christianity already. He was not so aloof from the doings of his province that he had failed to note the rise of the new religion. Neither was he the last to appreciate Christianity and Christians without changing his own life or skepticism in the least. This is the great trial to the Christ—the many educated and able, who know the Way but do not walk therein, those who in places of responsibility and power fail to make the great consecration, with all the wondrous possibilities for the Kingdom on earth before them.

But certainly Felix admired the personality of the apostle, and liked his company. He frequently talked with him. Luke gives an account of the first private interview when Felix brought his Jewish wife Drusilla to hear Paul. Faith in Jesus Christ was his theme. Felix was fascinated by the story that has charmed millions—of the conversion of the religious persecutor into a world missionary. He was deeply interested in Paul's explanation of the Messiahship and the place of Jesus in God's eternal plans. He was spell-bound by the account of Paul's journeys and adventures. (Well might he be. I have known a camp of a dozen boys to listen to chapter after chapter of the Book of Acts from the 20th Century Version.)

But when Paul began to make the practical application of religion to life and conduct, Felix was on trial before Paul. The tables were turned. The preacher knew his audience, for their misdeeds were public property. In addition to his bribery and corruption this governor was an adulterer, and the woman at his side was not his lawful wife. Daughter of Herod Agrippa (see Acts 12) she was the wife of Azizus, king of Hamath, when Felix the Roman crossed her path and persuaded her to become his mistress. Paul had three themes for their consideration—righteousness, self-control and the coming judgment. The first two were a sufficient indictment of this guilty pair, the third threw Felix into terror.

Frightened but Unconverted

FELIX was not repentant, however. He was only frightened. What a difference there is! Many a wrongdoer imagines himself repentant for his sins when he is only appalled at the consequences. Much of the terrific preaching by evangelists of a century ago frightened but did not regenerate the hearers. That is a sublime, a divine achievement. Felix had a guilty conscience. He saw himself as God saw him, and loathed the sight. But he was without vital repentance, without power to put his sin from him. He was hardened and could easily salve his conscience by telling Paul he was too busy to go further. At a more convenient season he would hear more.

Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. We shall ever find the most insidious temptation in the whole realm of character to lie in procrastination of decision. The soul that drifts is doomed. It is so easy to postpone repentance—easy but fatal.

Hudson Now Holds World's Greatest Hill-Climbing Record

Makes Fastest Time Up Pike's Peak

No hill-climb or mountain test in the world equals that imposed on motor cars that race to the summit of Pike's Peak. A Hudson Super-Six Special made the best time of more than 20 contestants to the top of America's most famous mountain, over the longest, steepest, highest travelable road in the world.

The start, at a mile and three-quarters above the sea, is higher by far than is the altitude of the finishing line in most hill-climbs.

The finishing point of Pike's Peak is almost two and three-quarters miles above sea level. In the twelve and a fraction miles of the course there are 60 turns, and the rise is almost one mile high. There is no place where the car is not climbing.

The high altitude affects the power efficiency of the motor and water boils at such low temperaature that motors cannot be cooled as they are in lower levels.

Hudson Fastest Time

The Hudson climbed up this winding, steep road to the "Top of the World" in 18 minutes, 24 seconds. Its time was 2½ minutes faster than the next fastest car.

This feat now gives to Hudson practically every worth-while record. In speed—when 102.3 miles an hour was attained at Daytona; in endurance—when 1819 miles were covered in 24 hours, with a stock Super-Six chassis we established marks not likely soon to be equaled.

Now we have added to these the greatest of all hill-climbing feats. In it we have shown the endurance of the Super-Six.

Others Failed

Motors of some of the most famous racing cars in the world were unable to withstand the strain of that climb and so did not get to the summit.

It is constant hard pulling all the way and more than three-quarters of the distance must be made in second speed, even with specially geared cars.

In addition to mere climbing, as is required in all hill-climbs, here is added the difficulties of carburetion and cooling.

The altitude that affects one's breathing so much that even the strongest man can stand only the least amount of physical exertion, has a similar effect in reducing the power of the motor.

We made that record in a contest in which were entered, as described by a Denver newspaper, "Fours—Sixes -Eights—Twelves and Super-Sixes."

And, as in all tests in which they have been entered, the best performance was shown by the Super-Six.

result of the second Balkan War German and Turkish troops are aiding the Bulgarians in considerable numbers. The important fortress of Silistria was wrested from the Rumanians during the week, and at the close the Bulgarian forces were rapidly nearing the railroad running from Chernavoda to Kustendje on the Black Sea.

Farther to the west the Bulgarian artillery is bombarding the Rumanian town of Giurgevo across the Danube from Rustchuk, directly opposite on the south shore of the river, apparently as a preliminary to attempting a crossing of the stream at this point and an advance on Bucharest, the Rumanian capital, about forty miles directly north of Giurgevo.

The river at this point is about three miles wide with a very deep and broad channel, and the moving of an army with its impedimenta across such an obstacle is far from child's play. It is true that the Bulgarians have an advantage in that their bank, the southern, rises abruptly from the river to a considerable height, while the northern bank is land flat, and hence artillery in position on the southern side can command the northern fairly completely, but the task will still be a hard one.

On the north the Rumanian forces are continuing to penetrate more deeply into the Austrian territory of Transylvania, but their rate of progress northward has been considerably slower than at first. Possibly they have been obliged to withdraw troops from this front for use against the Bulgarians in the south, as the amount of Russian help Rumania has received up to the present time does not seem to have been as much as might conservatively have been expected. Hermannstadt, their objective in the center, still remains in Austrian hands, and therefore the greatest progress has been made by the Rumanian wings. German troops are reported to have joined the Austrian troops defending this front. We may reasonably expect to see very hard fighting on all the Balkan fronts during the next two months, as both sides seem centering their efforts in this sphere of operations to a large degree.

For the past four weeks the Austro-Italian front has been without incident, and last week was no exception to the rule. The capture of Gorizia by the Italians has not yet led to any further results of importance, the Austrian defenses to the east and south of that city being apparently much stronger than the Italians had any idea of. On the south Tyrol front the deadlock continues unbroken, and on the other mountain fronts the difficulties of the terrain, which are both great and unending, have prevented appreciable results appearing. If my readers will plot out on the map the Italian territory held by the Austrians and the Austrian territory held by the Italians, they will perhaps be surprised to find that in area these holdings are not so very far from being equal.

VERY little news, indeed, has reached us from the Caucasus front during the week under review, so little that it is fair to assume that nothing of any importance has happened.

In German East Africa the British continue almost daily to report fresh advances or the capture of places of importance. The German defense seems crumbling, which is not perhaps surprising, as the German forces have been cut off from communication with the outside world, reinforcements or supplies for fully two years now. It has been already pointed out what supreme importance to the British scheme of having the Cape to Cairo Railroad run entirely in British territory the conquest by them of this German colony would have.

There has been some skirmishing to the northeast of the Suez Canal and in western Egypt during the week, but this activity was only of sufficient importance to indicate that the belligerents were still facing each other.

Sweden and Great Britain are still at issue over the questions of interference with Swedish mails and ships by British naval vessels. Sweden has had one of the very largest harvests in her history, as have also Norway and Denmark, which, as these countries have very similar climatic conditions to Germany, seems to give some color to the German claim of the largest harvest in fifteen years.

The eastern front was less active last week than for some time. The northern portion of the line had its calm disturbed only by an occasional clash, while even in the Stochod region, where for months the fighting has been so violent, the lull was pronounced

In Galicia the Russians made some rather fierce attacks on Halicz, to the north of Stanislau in the direction of Lemberg, but accomplished little.

Farther south in Galicia there was greater animation in the foothills of the Carpathians, where the Russians made numerous but only occasionally successful efforts to advance south and southeast. The object of such efforts apparently is to create a diversion here, which would prevent the Austrians from sending troops from this sector to Transylvania to aid in the defense of that province against the Rumanians. Such activity was greatest in the Karput region.

THERE has been heavy fighting on the Picardy front during all the period under review, and the Allies have had the best week in some time. The British, who hold the most northerly part of this front, after capturing Ginchy village completely on September 8, took a day or two's rest, but on Monday began a movement directly east from Ginchy, which yielded them some ground and a few hundred prisoners, followed by another small advance on the same portion of the front the next day. The following day the British began to prepare the way for a further advance by an artillery attack on the German trenches. On Friday their infantry was launched to the attack at a very strong point in the German defenses to the southeast of the village of Thiepval. Desperate fighting took place, particularly around a German field fortification known as Wunderwerk, but in the end the Germans were obliged to give way, and this field fort and a thousand yards of their trenches fell into British hands.

At the same time another assault was made on a six-mile front to the north of the road leading from Bapaume to Albert, and here, too, the British were too strong for their opponents and drove them back a couple of thousand yards. As this record closes hard fighting is still going on in this portion of the front.

North of the Somme the French began serious operations on Tuesday, September 12, and in a dashing offensive smashed the German trenches and thrust their lines forward to the east of the village of Combles, both to the north and south, thus almost surrounding that town. About 2,500 Germans were captured in these operations.

On the rest of the western front nothing of any particular interest took place.

Consider This Well

WE have received several letters from some of our good friends of the Christian Herald Family expressing regret that the Christian Herald will raise its price early in November to $2 a year. We regret it very much ourselves, for, as a matter of fact, the situation which has been forced upon us is very much worse than was indicated in our announcement of raised price. We have now received what practically amounts to an ultimatum from the paper manufacturers to the effect that we will have to pay, even under the most favorable circumstances, $80.000 a year extra for paper.

If we are compelled to do this, then the situation will indeed be very serious for the Christian Herald, unless, to be sure, we can have the active help of the members of the Christian Herald Family.

The issue is of tremendous importance, not only to our readers, but to the many charitable and other interests which depend upon our readers for their very life. Imagine the orphans in China, in India, in Japan being cast adrift; imagine what it would mean to have our Widows and Orphans Fund suddenly become inactive; imagine the effect on the Bowery Mission and on the Children's Home on the Hudson; imagine the dismay of the missionaries so greatly helped in various parts of the world; imagine the wide-spreading effect which the curtailment of these efforts would have on the very growth of the Kingdom!

Of course, we do not mean to let it happen. It may be the fight of our lives, but we mean to win out, and with the help of Christian Herald subscribers we shall do so. The Christian Herald is too great an institution, and the institutions which depend upon it for their very existence have too far-reaching an effect on the uplift of the world, to be smothered under the exactions of commercial circumstances.

Do you mean to do your part? Do you mean to help us go on with the work of the Christian Herald? Will you use your effort to bring in at least one —only one—new subscriber at the increased price?

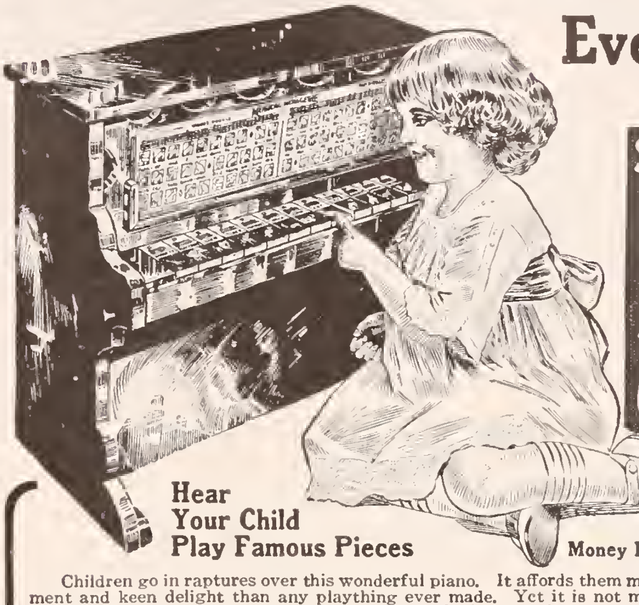
Each one of you can induce at least one friend to come in as a new subscriber. Will you not give us your promise that you will get us at least one new subscriber during the coming year? We would like to have you on record as meaning to do all in your power to help the Christian Herald bring to full fruition the many projects which it has inaugurated.



Most Remarkable Child's Piano Ever Made

Send Only 50 Cents

Hear Your Child Play Famous Pieces

Money Back If Not Satisfied

Children go in raptures over this wonderful piano. It affords them more wholesome amusement and keen delight than any plaything ever made. Yet it is not merely a plaything nor simply a toy. It is a real musical instrument—a child's size piano—on which the little ones can play like big sister or mama does on the Upright or Grand.

See Wonderful Animal Keyboard and Animal Music Chart

The secret of this Children's Piano lies in the keyboard and musical charts. The keyboard is made up of animals—here a dog, there a cat, horse, chicken, cow, etc.—all the animals that even a baby knows. The child follows the animal notes on Music Charts—and strikes animal keys on piano to correspond. It is more simple to learn than A. B. C.'s or counting "10." It is so easy to learn that children only four years of age readily pick out animal keys corresponding to animal notes on Music Chart and produce real music—"Farmer in the Dell," "London Bridge," "Yankee Doodle," "My Country 'Tis of Thee," etc., and sing to their own accompaniment. It will take only five to ten minutes before your child can actually play these pieces. In a short time they can play "Home Sweet Home." "Old Black Joe," "Annie Laurie," "Suwannee River," etc.

This Wonderful Children's Piano is tuned by piano experts. Keys are based on universal scale. Solidly constructed and finished in mahogany. Music Charts are printed on heavy enameled cardboard with pictures of animals, representing notes beautifully lithographed in many colors. Also shows notes in music to correspond. Words of song are printed under animal notes. Keys are faced with handsomely lithographed animal pictures in colors.

BIG JUMP IN MAGAZINE PRICES SOON

Renew Your Subscriptions to All Magazines At Once. Don't Delay. These Prices Will Be Withdrawn in a Few Weeks

It will never again be possible to obtain the Christian Herald in combination with other magazines at the prices given below. If you wish to order magazines other than the Christian Herald, use the alphabetical list below. We guarantee these prices to be the lowest obtainable.

The increase in the cost of paper, printing ink, labor, and in fact practically everything that goes into the making of a magazine, has made it necessary for many publishers (including the Christian Herald) who have heretofore maintained a very low price, to ask readers to pay more for a year's subscription. There is still an opportunity to order a new subscription or renew an old one for any of the magazines given below, before the increases become effective.

There are many excellent magazines that should be in every home, and the Christian Herald has endeavored to make it possible for our readers to obtain them by arranging the special prices given below. But we can make these offers only for a limited time.

All subscriptions are for one year. New subscriptions begin with the current issue. Renewal subscriptions are extended for one year from date of expiration. When two or more magazines are ordered, they can go to different names and addresses, except in the few cases noted otherwise.

Canadian postage on other magazines is usually 50 cents additional; foreign postage $1 additional.

Four Letters

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

E RY once in a while a certain tter stands out distinctly from e others in my mail basket. course, that it is any sweeter e letters from all my girls, but it shows a bit more thought, or ea, that might help one of you. er I find a letter of this sort I side to use some day when I am to you. I am quoting four today, which I think you will ghty interesting.

r a protracted illness," begins from the South, "during which pies of the Christian Herald in their folders, I was able this to sit in my Morris chair and few of them.

T copy dated July 5 contained an ticle from your pen entitled on the March.' I read it, the lf blinding me the while. I am woman with many blessings. I a lovely little city in a Southern ty town. I have troops of a dear little home, a flower-gled yard, a dusky attendant s served me for thirty-five years, sufficiency of what has been a competency. In health I d happy associations. In sick-ave had tender care.

(what an immense word that f three letters is!) I have had I have stood beside my be-nd have seen every one that was ecious to me pass into the great And the years have come and rs have gone, and I have walked y alone, largely reflecting upon s that are passed. I have never song as I marched along, trying Christian, trying to be trustful nkful, and to live a life void of to God and man. But I have en 'singing on the march.' I st called up a dear neighbor and r of your article, told her how s it was to me, and how I meant very hard to be a soldier woman g on the march.

l then the thought came to me you a grateful note, and tell at your words have done for y woman down in Dixie, who en songless, but who meant to sing. I venture to tell you this e writers, unlike speakers, do ays realize what blessings they ding out.

s not worth while that I give you ne. It is not one that will ever wn out of my own state; it is and inglorious' so far as the world goes. But it is the name of one whom you have helped, and who wishes you to know she means to read and re-read your 'Singing on the March,' until she, too, can sing and make not only her own way brighter, but a brighter way also for somebody else.

"This is written from a dear little home, occupied only by two mature women, mistress and maid. The maid, a singer, the mistress now wishing to be.

"Our little dwelling we call –
"The Little House on the Corner."

This letter is, I think, a beautiful one. But I wish the little lady had signed her name.

"ALTHOUGH a stranger to you," writes a girl from Michigan, "I want to tell you what your article in the last paper did for me. 'The Girls of Northfield' came to me on Wednesday morning, and I attended prayer meeting as usual on Wednesday night. Maybe you will understand me better when I tell you that I have attended prayer meeting many times, and although I am nearly twenty-three years of age have never been able to testify for Christ publicly. Timidity, or whatever it was, stopped me from doing so. But tonight I thought of your sweet, brave 'Girls of Northfield,' and the thought helped me to testify for the first time in my life. This may sound like a very small thing, but it means a great deal to me, for I will never again let the opportunity to testify slip by."

A farmer, who loves his farm, sends a message to my correspondents. Doesn't it make you city folks a bit envious?

"FARMING, it seems to me, brings us very near to nature, or, in other words, the Creator; as we are always near something that is developing or increasing by an unseen power. We drop a small seed into the soil and in a short time there is a beautiful plant, and after a few more days have passed a beautiful flower greets us; or it may be some grain to feed the famishing humanity. And again there are the ever persisting weeds, like little sins, that are always on hand to retard the growth of the good. Yes, farmers always have the Great Preacher preaching to them; but not all are ready to pass into the far country and meet him.

"I cannot imagine what a life in the city would be like, especially on hot days. And the children, where can they play? My playground was measured in miles. I have roamed at will over as many acres as I wished to, over rocks and through dells with the music of the birds to greet me and my thoughts for company, for I mostly traveled, or played, all alone. Therefore, I am a child of the woods.

This is the last of the four letters.

"THE other day, while attending a woman's meeting, a verse of poetry by your late grandmother was quoted by the lady who presided over the meeting, who commented on it, telling how its meaning had helped her so much.

"Then I thought, how little we realize what force spoken words have on other lives. How nicely the poet put it when he said:

"'More precious than the honeyed dew,
From flowers distilled of saffron hue,
Of rosy tint, or azure blue,
Are gentle words.'

"Thus the power of influence is very strong. Even though a person be dead, he yet speaks unto the people he once lived among.

"I, too, loved to read the poetry of your dear grandmother, as it seemed to grip my very heartstrings. This brings another thought to my mind.

"Persons, like plants, have a way of attracting others to them. Did you ever notice how many white and dull looking flowers are sweet-scented, while showy flowers, such as the tulip, foxglove and hollyhock, have little or no scent?

"So it is we find those individuals close at hand that are lovable when they are old and gray, as well as when they are young. We can find them wherever we wander, whether by land or sea; and their silent, magical power is at work everywhere around us.

"Miss Sangster, I, too, want to be one of those individuals going about in a silent way, doing good to others in the walks of life. I want a spirit all sunshine, graceful from very gladness, and beautiful because bright.

"Let us live so that our lives will count the most in this life and in the life to come. Let it be said of us, as it was said of one of old, 'She hath done what she could.'"

DID you like the letters, friend of mine? I hope that you liked them half as much as I did, and I hope that soon I shall be able to show you some more that are just as fine. Perhaps, next time, one of them will be yours!

The Christian Herald Prayer League

L Christians are urged to unite with e members of the Prayer League in rayer at the noon hour. Also any at liberty to send a request for or an acknowledgment of answered thereby becoming enrolled as a of the Prayer League.

A ONG the many letters received y the Prayer League this week, n unusual number record an-o prayer.

F. L. R., Bayfield, N. B., writes: al requests for prayer which were you have been answered. A man ife here have become more in y with each other after having ng in discord. A friend is greatly ed in health and I myself have rengthened spiritually and physi-I thank God for the Prayer ."

M. S., Pasadena, Calif., writes r husband has got employment in to prayer. Mrs. A. P. S., Ewell, who was stricken with paralysis months ago, is now praising God e is on the way to recovery, in to prayer.

nd S. B., of Gloversville, N. Y., "We thank our heavenly Father Prayer League. We know from al experience that God does fully answer prayer. We have seen it so many times. We sent in petitions for a daughter and daughter-in-law, which the Lord wonderfully blessed and answered."

Inspiring testimonies come from Memphis, Tenn. At the Noonday Prayer Meeting, conducted by Pastor Benjamin Cox, a mother reported that her son, for whom prayers had been offered, was found again. A young woman wrote that her eyes had been healed in answer to prayer. A merchant wrote that his sick wife, since being prayed for, had greatly improved. A man wrote that his hearing was far better and he requested prayer for complete restoration. Another man wrote that he had been brought from the gates of death through prayer. The Memphis Prayer League is growing rapidly, and its noontide meetings are largely attended.

Mrs. F. M. B., Alamo, Calif., writes she has had many wonderful answers to prayer. Her little son lay apparently dying. The nurse said he could not live many hours. The mother prayed most earnestly and then, feeling a great calm in her heart, turned to the nurse saying: "He is not going to die; he is better." The temperature of the little sufferer fell to normal. The prayer had been heard and his life was spared.

J. A., Englewood, Calif., was healed of fever in answer to prayer. I. S., Shawnee, Okla., joyfully records the conversion of her son, for whom prayers were requested some time ago. A. P., Millerton, N. Y., through prayer, received strength to undergo a severe operation successfully, and now praises God for restored health. A Mother in Michigan reports that her daughter, who was prayed for and who lives in a distant part of the state, is recovering. Mrs. L. M. N., New Hampshire, a lone widow, records the restoration through prayer of her home, which was broken up a year ago.

Mrs. M. S., Great Bend, Kan., praises God for restored health in answer to the prayers of the League, and another mother, in Garrett, Ind., is grateful for the recovery of her son in answer to prayer. Mrs. J. A. H., Portsmouth, Va., writes that a friend and the writer herself have both had their eyesight restored in answer to prayer and are devoutly grateful to God. "My friend can now see to read her Bible with her glasses and I can read without mine. The Lord has answered my prayers all through my long life from childhood. Bless his holy name! There is nothing like faithful, fervent prayer."

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter

Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

Bran

For Gentle Folks

Gentle folks, who eat fine foods, need bran constantly. And they want it in a luxury.

Bran is Nature's laxative.

Pettijohn's is a dainty, made of soft rolled wheat. It contains 25 per cent bran in flake form, and tender.

It is delicious and efficient. It means better breakfasts and better days. Both the food and results will delight you.

Prove that tomorrow morning.

prayers for employment for her boys. She writes: "Now they are employed and we feel grateful to God for his goodness to us."

Mrs. D. W. B., Hanover, Ind., writes: "We send this note in fulfilment of a promise made to the Lord that we would acknowledge his goodness. Our prayers have been answered, and we wish to thank him."

Mrs. C. G. O., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I wish to acknowledge to the Prayer League an answer to prayer which was a great blessing to me. I dreaded a serious operation and just before the ether was applied the words, 'Lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end,' came to me, and I felt as if God had me by the hand; there was perfect peace; I had no fear. Afterward the surgeon told me the success of the operation was a surprise to all. Prayer is wonderful!"

H. C. writes from Baltimore, Md.: "A young man in jail, suffering with tuberculosis, who a few days ago lost his father (he was unable to see him before he died), and who has an invalid mother, requests prayers that his mother's health may improve and that he may live to secure his liberty."

We might greatly add to these cases from the number of letters on hand containing similar acknowledgments.

Mme. Paderewski Appeals for Suffering Poland

To the Womanhood of America—Greetings and Love

MORE than five hundred thousand young girls of my country, Poland, have had their lives shattered by the greatest tragedy that can come to a woman.

Victims of the conquering and the retiring armies that have incessantly swept over Poland since the beginning of the war, these unfortunate young mothers, the majority of whose babies have died for want of food, clothing and shelter, find themselves outcasts—helpless, alone.

They come from all classes. That which made them the most pitiable of war victims does not respect rank nor recognize virtue. Their physical suffering, unspeakably severe as it has been, is exceeded by mental agony that increases with the realization of their condition as they face the future. A home must be provided for these unfortunate ones. They must be put into an atmosphere of hope and courage.

To this end I am asking aid for the founding of a home in Warsaw, the name of which will be The American Refuge for Suffering Womanhood, the gift of fortunate American women to their unfortunate sisters in far-away Poland. From this center, as an outgrowth, other branch institutions similar in aim and character, but entirely self-supporting, will be established in Galicia, Lithuania, and all over Poland.

By this means I hope not only to give aid to my needy countrywomen, but through them to revive the ancient arts for which Poland has been so justly famous, including tapestryweav making, metallic and silken em wood-carving, and the world-fa

Young People's Topics for October 8

What New Work Should Our Society Undertake?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic.
Ex. 14 : 8-15.

THE text chosen for this topic might not at first appear to be one to inspire vigorous action. "Moses said unto the people, Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord which he will show to you today. . . . The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." But hear the answer of Jehovah: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward.

Going forward did not appear easy. The rough waters of the Red Sea stretched before them, the mountains hemmed them in on either side, and the tumult of Pharaoh's galloping horsemen was behind them. But Moses, at God's command, lifted up his rod, the people started forward, and the sea was divided and rolled backward before them.

This, then, is to be our lesson. We are to go forward. Obstacles, difficulties, hindrances, are to be disregarded. If we are certain that we go forward at his command, we may be sure that his infinite power will hew out for us the path. We are to use our own strength as far as it avails and to trust God for the rest.

What new work shall we undertake? That work to which the Spirit clearly directs us. It may be only to do more thoroughly the work we are now doing. If we "endeavor" half-heartedly, if our committees work spasmodically, if children in the Sunday school are reaching the proper age without being drawn into our society, if we are out of touch with the general work, if any of these conditions exist, the most important work is to remedy them. If our society is fully alive and truly efficient and ready with abounding, consecrated young life for a definite task, prayer and observation and the advice of the pastor will, without doubt, develop the answer to the question of the topic.

Witnessing for Christ

Epworth League Topic. John 1 : 41, 42;
Ps. 40 : 10; Acts 1 : 8.

"YE shall be witnesses unto me." Thus spoke the ascending Christ. We, who have come to be called Christians, are his witnesses. Now a witness testifies, and more, he testifies only to that which he knows. Therefore we must know Jesus as our Saviour. Witnessing for Christ is not, however, limited to verbal testimony. Unless our life, day by day, shows forth his spirit, our words will hardly be admitted as valid testimony.

Are we in business? Are we asked to do an underhanded thing, or to misrepresent a piece of merchandise, or to hide the secret of a plan to injure another? If we say, "No, do this thing," even at the cost of o ment, we witness for him; but if w conscience with the false assuran employees we are only carrying out of our superior and the guilt is all hi lose our chance to witness, and t
God walks no more with us.

Are we in school? Is an examin and the opportunity to cheat alm lenge? Are we on the team, and does "dirty" play seem sure to win? A contest, and does some one offer to us our opponent's votes? If we re fully to do the wrong thing we witne but if we yield we are soon mark whole student body as a cheat and as and our influence is gone and our nullified.

Andrew, having found Christ, im sought his brother. There is no bet of witnessing than the effort to brin soul to the Saviour. But if we re Christ, our lives will not only witne we shall not only be swift to message to individuals, but we heard praising him in the co his saints, and among sinners, to

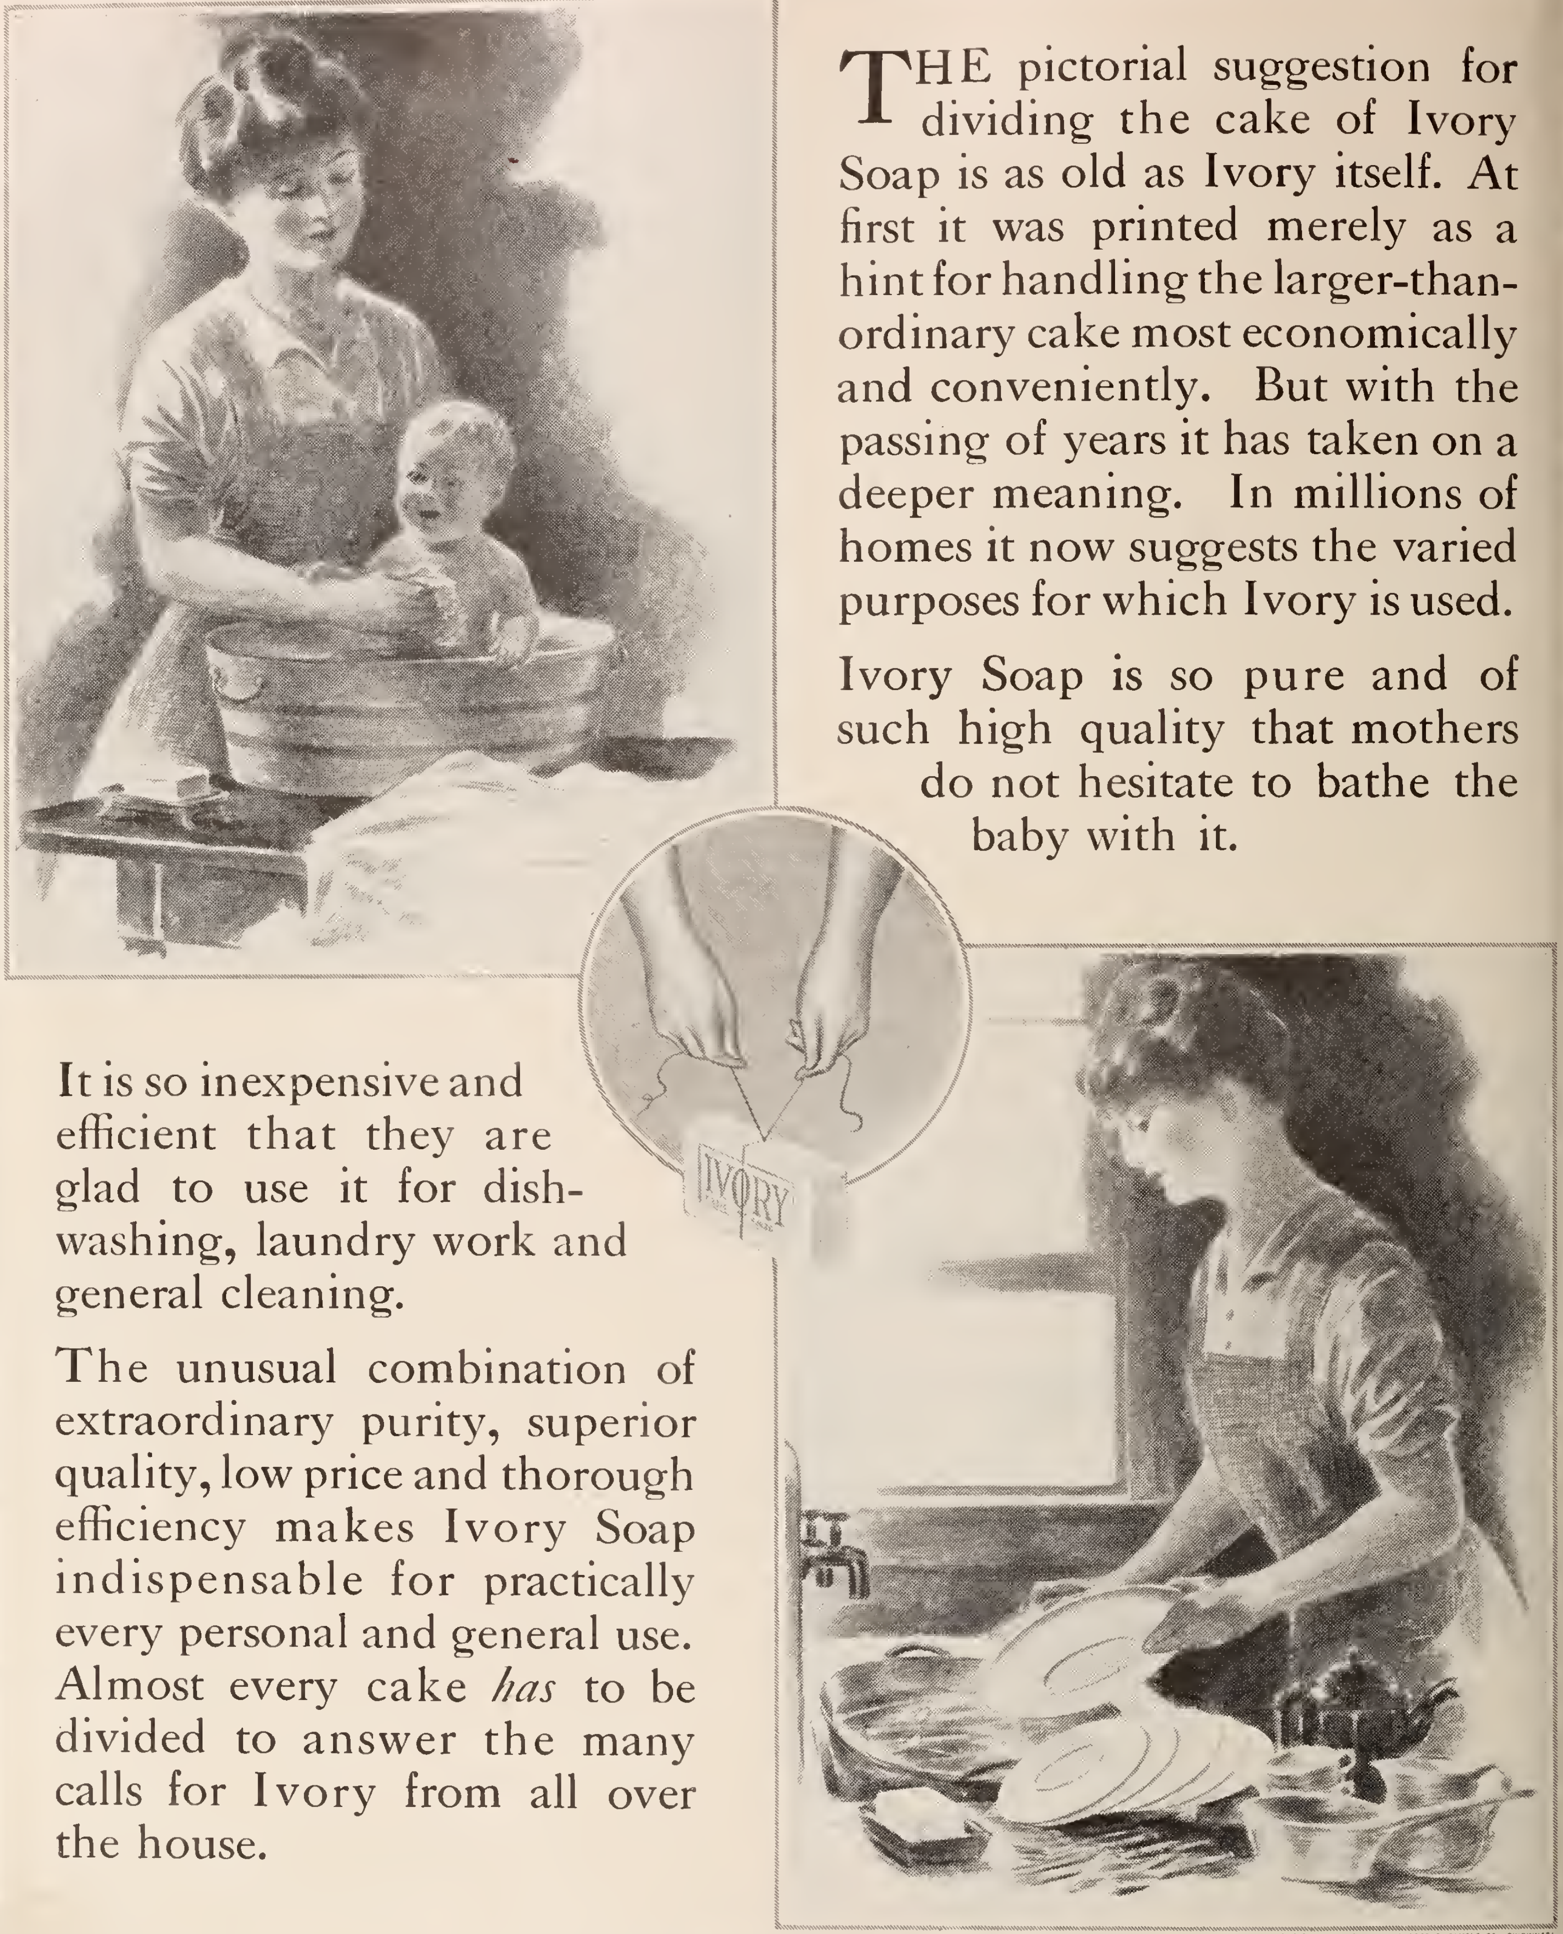
A MOHAMMEDAN VILLAGE SCHOOL IN RAMAH, PALESTINE.



THE pictorial suggestion for dividing the cake of Ivory Soap is as old as Ivory itself. At first it was printed merely as a hint for handling the larger-than-ordinary cake most economically and conveniently. But with the passing of years it has taken on a deeper meaning. In millions of homes it now suggests the varied purposes for which Ivory is used.

Ivory Soap is so pure and of such high quality that mothers do not hesitate to bathe the baby with it.

It is so inexpensive and efficient that they are glad to use it for dish-washing, laundry work and general cleaning.

The unusual combination of extraordinary purity, superior quality, low price and thorough efficiency makes Ivory Soap indispensable for practically every personal and general use. Almost every cake has to be divided to answer the many calls for Ivory from all over the house.

The Church and Its Task

By PERRITON MAXWELL

"CHRISTIANITY is in peril of extinction; the church itself is menaced from within its own walls. The followers of Jesus Christ are either asleep with Peter in the garden or a ke with Judas leading an attack on the gate—le argy on the one hand, treachery on the other. To m he most ominous religious sign of the times is the d away from the church."

hese are the stinging and woeful phrases of Rev. J. . Shaw, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of hicago. The preacher went on to point out that tl Bible has been expelled from our public schools, tl religious training has been largely abandoned in o American homes, that children are generally ex- c d from church and Sunday school attendance, tl we are a luxurious and coldly commercial nation, tl we are leading the world to believe that the c ch is the friend and champion of sordid wealth or h tless monopoly, that Christian leaders are them- se s careless of their church obligations, and that t thirds of Christian America is today outside the c ch—thirty million non-communicants. And Dr. S v, without being able to answer his own question, as : "Which are doing the greater harm in the church t y, the betraying Judases or the sleeping Peters?"

ut arrayed against this critical broadside by the C ago preacher are some facts which, if they do not r te his statements, seem to prove that we are as a n on deeply religious, and that our religion, if pra- ti l away from the church, is none the less deep- r ed and sincere. Recent investigations of religious c litions in the United States tend to show that r ious belief, in its broadest sense, has outgrown the c ch; that the soul of man has expanded and em- b ed humanity and the universe.

VAST and significant movement is taking place that is adding to the physical as well as the m al acreage of religion, in the new preaching of epentance and the new and vigorous vision of lvation, presented chiefly out of doors or i eat temporary sheds and tents, by evangel- is who are trying to make of humanity one g t religious family. Everywhere that these h -acre gospel barns have been erected, the w kers have gathered in spiritual wrecks by tl tens, the hundreds and the thousands, put- ti new light, new hope into their lives. And tl preachers from their drab and stationary p its look on with profound astonishment.

hat is the significance of all this? Why do peo- pl orsake the church and fixed forms of religion o he one hand and flock to outdoor preaching o e Cross on the other? Are we less religious, in orthodox sense, than ever before? Do we li our religion unfettered by creeds, extending tl rontiers of faith by simply believing in the ul nate good of man, and is that belief at the r of the movement toward less formal worship?

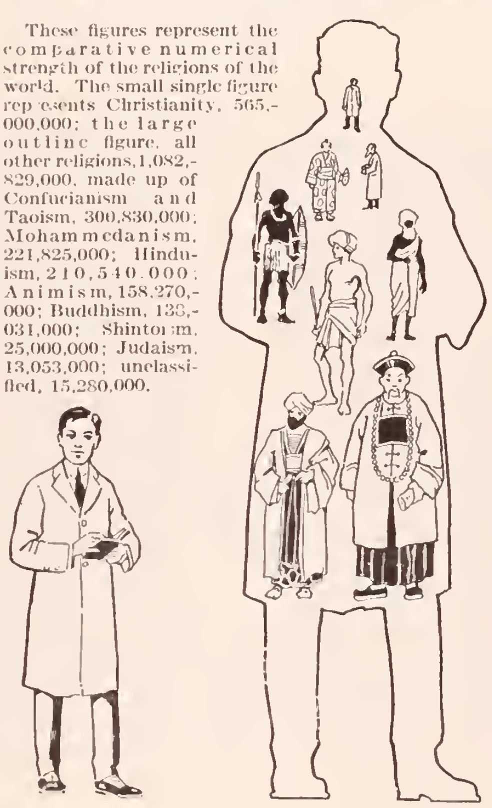
WITH two hundred and sixty-eight million Roman Catholics and one hundred and se nty-seven million Protestants in the Christian world, the church peril, of which Dr. Shaw is so fearful, does not seem of immediate menace. If the 38,805,559 communicants of all churches in the United States should get active along the strenuous lines laid down by Evangelists Sunday, Biederwolf, and the many others who are both arousing and helping the people spiritually, a good proportion of the more than sixty million presumably godless Americans not on the books of any church might be won by the church.

A bird's-eye survey of the religious territory of this country will discover, besides these informal churches, many summer colonies where people congregate, practically in the open, to worship according to their various forms of belief.

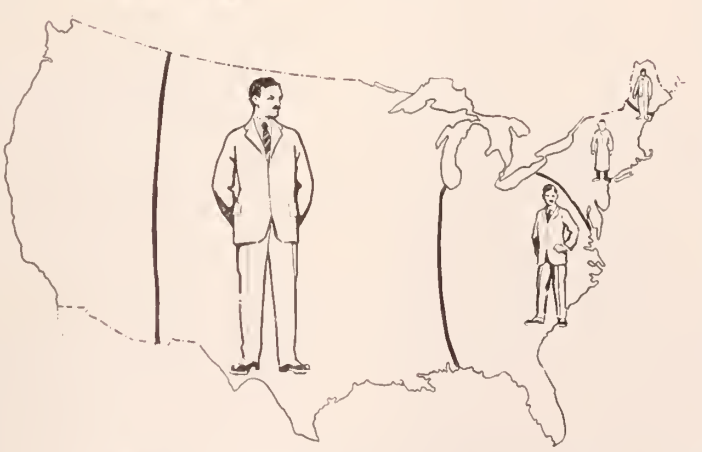
Ocean Grove, facing the Atlantic on the New Jersey coast, is an actual square mile of religion—the biggest church in the world—an incorporated religious association with 30,000 members, a tremendous combination of business efficiency and religious devotion. Its roof practically open to the smiling heavens, the sea singing an unceasing anthem of inspiration, Ocean Grove is an inestimable spiritual power. Numerically stronger than the latter, the three thousand Chautauqua Assemblies, attended every summer by four million people, constitute the biggest out-of-door religious gatherings ever held in any country. To witness the spectacle of an entire village and all its countryside, whose winter tastes are inclined toward nature-study or poetry and whose interests all the rest of the year are clearly divided into sects and social circles, move into tents together for a week, is to view human nature from an entirely new angle. Scattered throughout the United States, these Chautauqua meetings are not strictly religious gatherings, though basically their purpose is Bible study and religious stimulus. Literally millions have been spurred into finer activities and nobler thoughts by reason of the Chautauqua movement.

The Catholic Summer School of America, with a big camp on the Western shore of Lake Champlain, the Young Men's Christian Association, with its Lake Geneva (Illinois) camp conferences, the Silver Bay Association, with 1,550 acres at Lake George where an average of three thousand persons gather for "summer Christian conference," are some of the more important movements toward the extension of religious teaching. When one remembers that the total space covered by the fifteen great cathedrals of the world, from that of St. Peter in Rome to that of St. John the Divine in New York, is only a matter of 1,327,323 square feet, and that Ocean Grove alone greatly exceeds that area, one is inclined to think religion at the seashore more popular than when roofed over and architecturally glorified. The Census Bulletin for 1909 gives the total seating capacity of all church edifices in the United States as 58,536,830. But Dr. Shaw contends that most of these pews are empty or only half filled.

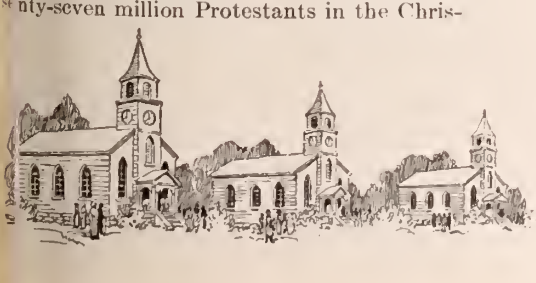
And yet publishers declare that one thousand and thirty two books dealing with theology and religion were published last year—twenty-one volumes less than all the new novels issued; and, as every one knows, works of fiction lead



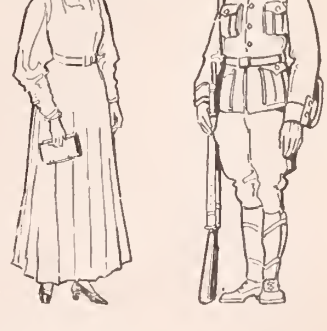
These figures represent the comparative numerical strength of the religions of the world. The small single figure represents Christianity, 565,000,000; the large outline figure, all other religions, 1,082,829,000, made up of Confucianism and Taoism, 300,830,000; Mohammedanism, 221,825,000; Hinduism, 210,540,000; Animism, 158,270,000; Buddhism, 138,031,000; Shintoism, 25,000,000; Judaism, 13,053,000; unclassified, 15,280,000.



If required to occupy sections of the United States by themselves, religious adherents would require the extent of space indicated in this map as follows (left to right): those of no religious affiliations, 23,000,000; Protestant Christianity, 64,100,000; Roman Catholicism, 11,000,000; Judaism, 2,044,000; all others, 100,000.



An approximate idea of the seating capacity of church edifices of the United States, (left) that would be necessary if everybody went to church; (center) as at present provided; and (right) as is necessary for those who do go to church.



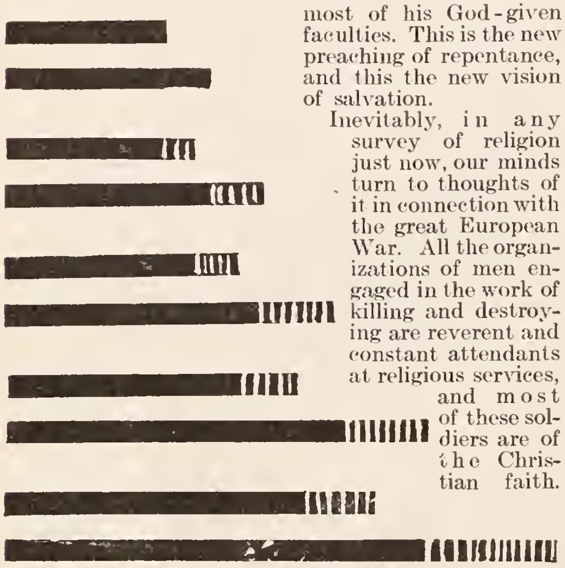
The two figures at the right represent approximately the relative numerical strength of the Sunday schools and the standing armies of the world.

the list of all books issued every year. A nation that reads as many religious works as it does novels cannot be accused of being irreligious.

THE consensus of philosophic opinion seems to be that religion has outgrown denominationalism and sectarianism. If the church, clinging to ancient forms of dogma and ethics, is not enlarging its physical territory, it is because it is too small to hold the new spirit, if it has not, indeed, shrunk in upon itself. As the Rev. Charles D. Williams, "an insurgent Christian," and Bishop of Michigan, says: "The church preaches, for the most part, a narrow and petty round of ethics, the minor moralities of purely personal conduct, respectabilities, good form, technical pieties and ecclesiastical proprieties, while the age is seeking the larger righteousness of the kingdom of God, which is 'human society organized to the will of God.'" And it is this new, unhoused evangelism, made up of the same elements as the old, but shorn of its hampering limitations, that is overflowing like a rain-swollen river the confines of the church, spreading over the length and breadth of our land, adding mile upon mile of real religion to the map.

The besetting sins of society as it is now constituted are war, strife, competition—luxury for a few, want for the many. A reborn society would insist on peace, not war; cooperation, not competition; in place of extremes of luxury and want, a distribution of property which will assure every human being a chance to make the most of his God-given faculties. This is the new preaching of repentance, and this the new vision of salvation.

Inevitably, in any survey of religion just now, our minds turn to thoughts of it in connection with the great European War. All the organizations of men engaged in the work of killing and destroying are reverent and constant attendants at religious services, and most of these soldiers are of the Christian faith.



If church membership is increasing scarcely two per cent. annually, while the population of the United States increases more than two per cent., these lines approximately indicate first, the comparative proportion of Christians of all creeds to the total population, and then the proportionate increase in population in excess of increase in church membership at the end of five, ten, fifteen and twenty years. As the author asks, At this rate, when will the evangelization of the United States be accomplished?

"The total space covered by the fifteen cathedrals of the world is greatly exceeded by that of Ocean Grove."

The battle lines scarring the length and breadth of the European continent register the presence of those trained in the Christian Church. As never before in Christian history that church confronts today the challenge of materialism. How is it to meet this challenge? "In the face of this disaster (the war in Europe) it is for the churches to mobilize their spiritual forces anew and bear themselves toward the warring nations, toward China and Japan, in such a way that this land will be a Messianic nation," is the solution of the Rev. Dr. Charles R. Brown of the National Council of Congregational Churches. If the army of the Lord as conceived by Dr. Brown could be brought into being it should prove an invincible force for the suppression of war. More than 40,000,000 persons are represented by the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish churches; and clergymen to officer this army number 180,000. In addition to these there is within the church in the United States a force of 15,000,000 Sunday school scholars, with 1,650,000 teachers to inspire and lead them in a campaign against organized slaughter.

The church has a task, its leaders say, in the evangelization of the race; but they admit that in the period of reconstruction which must follow the war it will need to do its utmost to uphold the ideals for which true religion stands, to make permanent individual, national and international standards of morality. The world looks to the church to extend its boundaries and increase its preparedness against future wars. It is a mighty task, which many men high in church counsels do not think it can accomplish. Evangelist Biederwolf is with Dr. Shaw in declaring the church not only unfitted for such an undertaking but incapable of caring for its own immediate advancement. "I am not a pessimist," says Mr. Biederwolf, "but we must not blind our eyes to the truth. The Presbyterian denomination, with early 2,000,000 members, made a net gain la year of only one and four-fifths per cent The Methodist Church did about the same hing. The Congregational, and the Reforme and the Evangelical Churches must confes with humiliation to a net gain of one per cent The Lutheran Church little more than held h own, while the Baptist Church and the Episco l can boast of the merest fraction over two pe cent. The average gain of all combined is no more than two per cent."

Meanwhile, the population of the ited States increased during the same period that covered by Evangelist Biederwolf's st stics more than two per cent., and he as , as a simple problem in mathematics, how l g, at this rate, is it going to take to evangeli the land? And all the while religious belief a l the practice of the Golden Rule is spreadin over the whole country. Men and wome are turning from dogma to the everyday pplication of Christian truths. The extension real religion is away beyond the aggregate real state of the churches, beyond their parochial boun ries. "There must be, from now forward," says Professor Walter Rauschenbusch, whose book, "hristianity and the Social Crisis," made a pr ound impression upon religious thought in this co try, "quite a new teaching and preaching—the pre hing of repentance from social sin and the need of ocial salvation. The old evangelism fixed the att tion of a man upon himself, a selfish saving of l nself from hell; the new evangelism fixes his att tion equally upon the other man—upon the salvatic and reconstruction of human society." (But savin ne's self from perdition is the keynote of Billy Su ay's success. Whether that success is permanent not remains for time to prove.)

SUMMED up in a brief word, it appears that reat spiritual unrest is abroad in the land; that the churches cannot still this unrest many outside fluences are doing so; and that while church atter nce is decreasing or not keeping pace with the ratio increasing population, mankind is struggling for tter motives for living and a more unselfish attitude t ard one's neighbor. With the passing of the days, uare mile is being added to square mile of re ion, not by increasing the number of ground plc for the erection of steepled structures and v lted cathedrals, nor by the erection of temporary spel sheds and camp-meeting tents, but by the ext sion of the areas in which human sympathy and elpfulness, under the sway of the Golden Rule, a displacing greed and strife. It remains to be seen the Church of Christ will shake off her letharg and assume once more her proper place as the sp ual leader of the race.

What Is Meant by the Second Coming of Christ

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

EVEN a cursory reading of the New Testament reveals that our Lord Jesus Christ is to come again to earth.

We remember his comforting words to his disciples on the night in which he was betrayed, recorded in John 14: "In my Father's house are many mansions; . . . I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." And his words spoken under very different circumstances the next day, when, abjured by the high priest, he affirmed: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. 26 : 64).

His testimony is continued by the angels after his ascension, when, addressing the waiting disciples on Mount Olivet, they say: "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven" (Acts 1 : 11).

Following the day of Pentecost, Peter renews the assurance to the surprised and excited multitude, saying that He in whose name the lame man had been healed had been received into heaven "until the times of the restoration of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets" (Acts 3 : 21).

The apostle Paul is very full of the subject. He represents the Corinthian church as "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 1 : 7). He tells the Philippians that "our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ" (3:20). The Thessalonians are taught that "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God" (I Thess. 4 : 16). Titus is directed to instruct his hearers that "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts" they "should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus 2 : 12, 13).

John, James and Jude all refer to it in a similar way, the language of the first-named being very familiar: "Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen" (Rev. 1 : 7).

Indeed, Bible students with a talent for such matters have counted the number of times in which the second coming of Christ is alluded to in the New Testament in one form or another, and while there is a variation in their figures, yet the lowest is 300. This shows the importance attached to it by the divine Author of the Scriptures, and gives countenance to the statement that, with the exception of our redemption through the death of Christ, there is no doctrine of Christianity that receives greater emphasis.

BUT what does it mean? Strange that there should be a question about it where the language seems so simple and convincing! But question there is, nevertheless; and from time to time there have been those who have tried to spiritualize or allegorize it away.

1. Some have said that the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2) sufficiently fulfilled the promises of Christ's second coming. But is this true? When you think of it, the condition on which the Holy Spirit came at Pentecost was the departure of Christ and not his return! Did he not say, "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you" (John 16 : 7)? We thus see that the Holy Spirit is not the same Person as Christ. In the Godhead they are one, but as a manifestation of the Godhead to men Christ is another Person than he. His work supplements that of Christ and prepares for his coming reign, but it cannot be regarded as that reign itself. Indeed, rist especially differentiates the coming of the oly Spirit from his own coming, saying, "I will pra the Father, and he shall give you another Comfort ."—not me, but another.

2. Some have said that the fall of Jerusalem der Titus, A. D. 70, is the event to which certain the promises of the second advent refer. But ke 21 : 20-28, which is predictive of that event, i opposed to such a thought. For example, it says, "hen ye see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then ow that the desolation thereof is nigh." This was rue indeed in Titus's time, but the second comi of Christ is associated uniformly not with the solation but the restoration of Jerusalem. See, for ustration, Zechariah, chapters 12 to 14. Again, ke says that after the desolation of Jerusalem by tus the Jews will "be led away captive into all th nations," which was literally fulfilled. But Isaia 14, having in mind evidently the second coming of C ist, says that in that day the Jews "shall take them ptive whose captives they were, and they shall ule over their oppressors." Luke says that after the solation of Jerusalem the city "shall be trodden wn of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles b ulfilled," a parenthesis of time which has existed om that day until this. But he also adds that, en those "times of the Gentiles" are fulfilled, "en shall they see the Son of Man coming in a ud with power and great glory." Neither the perio nor the description in this case fits in with the desol on of Jerusalem under Titus.

3. Others spiritualize the promises of Ch t's second coming and resolve them into a spir al coming only. But this is inconsistent with he meaning of the words revealing that event, as ill be noted later on. It also is inconsistent wit he literal fulfilment of the predictions concerning is first coming. If that was personal and visible, hy not this? Indeed, from the human conception o he

The Peasants of Rumania

By FELIX J. KOCH

PICTURESQUE, poverty-stricken Rumania, after keeping Europe so long on the "anxious seat" as to whether or no she would fight, has finally cast her die, and is now to be accounted one of the factors in the big continental battle-game. Rumania has gone into the war, and with her going there enters one of the strangest peoples on earth. Its uniqueness comes out of its utter poverty; and the poverty can be best described as it unfolds itself to the tourist penetrating into the heart of the land.

Starting from a given county seat—or, as they would put it, "district capital"—one drives on for mile upon mile before coming to sight of a village. Then suddenly there rises over the surface of the plain, in what appears to be a meadow, many billows of earth, resembling nothing so much as the piles of the Mound Builder. Young trees sprout on the hillocks, and there may be a litter of dogs nestling at one side. That these should be human habitations seems incredible.

On nearer approach one discovers that these mounds have a door, leading into the ground. The narrow hall is supported by a set of boughs from the forest. Adobe is then packed in, and to the whole is given a coating of whitewash. At the end of the hall there is a cave, dug from the ground and fitted with walls that rise possibly two or three feet above the surface. This is the parlor, sitting-room, and bedroom of the gipsy family. A kettle over some fagots on the hearth, a table, some worn crockery and a cat make up the visible furnishings. Beyond there may be an extra cubby for the children.

These gipsy homes are, of course, the extremes. The Christian villages are but little better. On first approach to them one is startled by the largest hay stack that the American will probably ever have seen. Rod upon rod this monster stretches upon the horizon. The explanation is a simple one. Hay is one of the largest articles of production in Rumania. Landed proprietors and peasants, one and all, raise it and depend on it for their support. When, however, a peasant feels grievances intolerable, it is a matter of no great difficulty to set the proprietor's hay afire—and no peasant in the district would think of assisting in the detection of the incendiary. So the law permits the proprietor to force all the peasants in the district to place their hay with his, a record of the weight of each man's contribution being kept by both sides. In the event of fire—and it now behooves both sides to guard against this—all contributors suffer in proportion.

Behind the stack will be found the village. We may pass through, but not halt within its limits, unless we have a pass from the district town. In many cases this permission will be telephoned ahead to the mayor; otherwise he will see to it that no strangers stop inside the town.

Each village house itself seems but a mass of willow switches, wattled together, the interstices being then chinked in and about with mud, so that the place resembles nothing so much as the Dahomey villages of World's Fair times. Along the road, beneath the locusts, rise high walls of it, hiding the yards behind as Turkish women were wont to screen their faces from the masculine gaze. From the street wall other fences run back to the meadows, to inclose a yard.

Possibly this Rumanian boy wonders what you see about him or his home to wonder at

Whether the grandmother is the proudest of these three, or the mother, or the third generation, you may decide for yourself

Passing through the fence, one will see the home, usually the bare, brown mud walls alone, but occasionally coated over with a whitewash of slightly blue tinge, and now and then boasting a portico, on which repose old sheepskin coats, green peppers, cats, and the great troop of village dogs, the scavengers of the highway.

Inside the homes, poverty is everywhere manifest. The floors are of earth, on which the family go about barefoot in order to save the costly shoes. The oven is of earth; the bed is a plank, set against the wall; and the artistic is supplied by a single cheap icon. Opulent peasants may go so far as to cover their walls with a cheap cloth, which gives a decidedly pretty effect, but they are the exceptions. For food on their table, there is one dish that is common to all, and that is a soft meal of maize. In addition, there will be mangoes, the poor man's friend in the Balkans, either stuffed with cabbage, roasted or boiled, and, possibly, a potato. Sheep's cheese is also served; but bread is a rarity, and then it is of the black variety always. Meat, of course, is to be had on great occasions only.

At one end of the village stands the symbol of their wrongs — the home of the landed proprietor, to whom the adjoining thousand-odd hectares of land belong.

Seldom if ever is the noble here. He lives in Vienna or Paris, and leaves the place in charge of some Greek or Macedonian, who has the stewardship for a term of five years, with the intent of making all he can, first for himself, and then for the proprietor.

From time to time, since 1840, the Rumanian government has divided the land among the peasants, this land, then, must remain in the family. As families increase, however, this patrimony becomes less and less sufficient for the clan, and there is nothing left for some of them to do but to take service out. That is putting oneself in the hands of the manor-lord or his steward. The usual method is to assign the peasant a section of the manorial lands, to be tilled by himself and his family and oxen on "halves" of the crop. Over seventy per cent. of the people are illiterate, however, owing to laxity in the enforcement of the compulsory school laws; and so it requires no very great degree of skill to fleece them out of their proper shares.

Should the man complain, no work will be given him the next year; and in some of the villages round Gradobor one sees peasants, half-starved, lolling in the little inns and gossiping, not because unwilling to work, but because there is absolutely nothing for them to do; and they have no money to emigrate elsewhere.

On what the peasant does get, moreover, the taxes are exorbitant. A village mayor receives a salary of but $42 a year, in order that he may be forced to live from one-tenth of the tax yield of his commune, and so see to it that everything is actually listed. So where a peasant has managed to scrape together something, it means for him an additional tax.

A suggestion here of the gipsies, and perhaps with cause

When you finish your scrutiny, these boys will go ahead with their own affairs

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

CHINA MAY KEEP HER INTEGRITY. Formal assurances have been given to the United States by both Japan and Russia that the new treaty of alliance between those countries is not a threat to the integrity of China. A note handed to Ambassador Guthrie in Tokyo on September 13 stated that the new treaty was not designed in any sense to repeal or modify Section 2 of the Portsmouth Treaty of 1907, which reads as follows: "The two high contracting parties (Russia and Japan) recognize the independence and territorial integrity of the empire of China and the principle of equal opportunity in whatever concerns commerce and industries of all nations in that empire, and engage to sustain and defend the maintenance of the status quo and respect for this principle by all the specific means within their reach." Notwithstanding their protestations, the demands of Japan and the steady encroachments of Russia make it appear that China may be left at last with only her integrity, her independence being lost and her territory benevolently assimilated into the spheres of influence of her neighbors.

A CORDUROY ROAD FOR COMMERCE. In spite of the restrictions imposed by the Allied nations and the uncertainties and difficulties due to war conditions, American commerce in the first seven months of 1916 reached a total of exports and imports of $4,394,040,948; an excess over the total for the entire year 1914. On September 14 the British issued a new order affecting the shipment of goods to Holland and the Scandinavian countries. After October 1 the British government will not permit the shipment of certain goods to the countries named. The lists vary for the different countries, but that for the Netherlands is fairly illustrative of the four, and includes biscuits, bristles, eggs, egg yolk and egg albumen, fish oil, fruit, nuts and kernels, gums, hair, honey, matches, pitch, preserved and canned goods, sulphur, spirits, spices, starches, rubber and balata, powdered talc, tar, vegetable fibers, and yeast. Meats, animal oils and fats, and high speed steel are forbidden to Scandinavia.

THE RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY DENIED. There is a strike under the leadership of the I. W. W. in the Jermyn & Company collieries, near Scranton, Pa. On September 14, according to the press, a meeting of the I. W. W. in Old Forge, for which the authorities had refused to issue a permit, was raided by the sheriff, and 318 of those present were arrested and locked up, charged with riot. There was no serious resistance. On the following day, 189 of those arrested were fined ten dollars each, and each was held under $5,000 bail on a charge of inciting to riot, conspiracy and unlawful assembly. The public solicitor insisted upon prohibitive bail, declaring, "We intend to break up the I. W. W. in Old Forge." It was said that out of 300 men arrested only fourteen were American citizens, and the authorities were considering the deportation of those not citizens. But what will they do with the first and eighth amendments to the Constitution of the United States?

LIFTS BAN ON RELIEF. The Turkish government on September 15 advised the State Department at Washington that it would consent to the shipment of relief supplies from the United States to famine sufferers in Syria. This consent does not apply to Armenia.

A MILLION SAVED FOR THE NEW NAVY. The superdreadnought Arizona, sister ship of the Pennsylvania, recently commissioned, was reported on September 17 to be practically complete, and to have been finished at the New York Navy Yard at a cost of a million dollars less than the estimates of independent constructors. The Arizona will be commissioned in October, and will be one of the greatest fighting machines afloat. Her displacement is 31,400 tons. She is 608 feet long, and mounts twelve 14-inch guns, which can be fired in a single broadside, the weight of a broadside being about 17,000 pounds. She also carries the usual complement of smaller guns, and when fully commissioned will be manned by 1,000 officers and men.

ENGLAND CALLS ANOTHER AMERICAN MINISTER. City Temple in London has called to its pulpit Rev. Joseph Fort Newton of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The Metropolitan Tabernacle in London is served by the Rev. A. C. Dixon, who was called to the pulpit from Chicago.

CATERPILLARS IN THE ARMY. The United States army is now organizing a horseless regiment of heavy field artillery. The regiment will be equipped with heavy field guns, pulled by Holt "caterpillar" tractors. Field guns of 9.5 inch caliber are already under construction for this regiment, and experiments are being made with 16-inch field howitzers, which are expected to be the equal of any field weapon now smashing men and defenses in Europe. The artillerymen will ride on motorcycles with side cars, the officers will ride in military automobiles, and the ammunition will be carried by motor trucks. The caterpillar tractors will be armored for protection but will carry no guns. Two of the batteries will be equipped with the new six-inch heavy field howitzer, recently adopted after experiments at Fort Sill. The regiment will be known as the Ninth Heavy Field Artillery, and is to be stationed permanently in the Hawaiian Islands.

FATAL FLOODS IN BOHEMIA. By the breaking of the dam near Gablonz, Bohemia, a flood of water was sent rushing through the industrial communities in the valley below. Seven villages were inundated, the l t of being included in the flood nine mi utes after the breaking of th dai Telephone warnings saved man live but the flood came too sudd ly permit the saving of all the p ple its path. At last reports over 30 bodi had been recovered, and it was ougl that the death list might reach 00.

On the night of September 3 thirteen Zeppelins raided London. One of them, caught full by the searchlights, was seen to be surrounded by bursting shells. It hung like a bar of polished steel among the shellburst, then it was gone. It fell near Cuffley, thirteen miles north of London, and for days the wreck was surrounded by throngs seeking relics, as shown in the photograph CANADIAN CROPS SHORT. Th an dian government estimates the p bab yield of wheat this year at ghtl under 169,000,000 bushels, as co pare with 376,000,000 last year. T e o crop is expected to drop fror 520 000,000 to 341,000,000 bushels, t wi be greater than the 1914 crop Th rye crop will be about 2,000,000 l shel a loss of 400,000, and barley 34, 0,00 against 53,000,000 last year. O crop however, exceeds the record la year, and that is the Cape Co crar berry crop. Those of us who n ge the turkey will be sure of the fix gs.

Th gun fires a shell weighing 2,100 p und The target was a piece of armo plate backed up with timber and sa bu the shell went through it all, din its career by smashing throu th kitchen of a house about a mile way demolishing a porch beside the k chen and falling to the ground, red hot a fev feet beyond. It was said that or hal the usual charge was used.

MILLIONS IN FRUIT. Accord g to the annual report of the Cal rnia Fruit Growers' Exchange, the Ex ange in the year ending August 31 h dled for members fruit having a tot de livered value of $38,500,000, rom which there was a net return the growers in California of $27,7 000, a gain of more than one-third o the previous year. The Exchange n has 8,000 members, maintains 77 d trict sales officers, 17 district exchange and 162 shipping associations. Th Ex change members forwarded 12,1 ,520 boxes of citrus fruit, which was per cent. of such fruit shipped from ali fornia during the year.

A WORLD GIRDLE OF AME CAN COTTON. Export statistics o the United States government show t t in the twelve months ending with une. the total shipments of finished Am can cotton manufacturers reached a alue of $46,414,200, a sum slightly low the figure for the annual perio just preceding, the loss in volume ing attributed to the demoralized ndition of ocean shipping. American rint cloths have gone to Cuba and her West Indian islands, Mexico, C tral and South America, Aden, China the British East Indies, Australia the Philippines and other islands of Oc nia. Business was lost in China on ac unt of Japanese competition. Ja ese factories are reported to have sh ped in the first six months of 1916 ton goods to the value of $23,415,0 , a gain of nearly $11,000,000 ove the corresponding six months of 915. the Japanese export having gone l gely to India and Siberia.

Mr. Payne was a bachelor, and the money was held until the government could find an accredited heir to whom to pay it.

VILLA CHALLENGES CARRANZA. Later reports of the Villa raid on Chihuahua City on September 16, received through Brigadier General George Bell, indicate that Villa had advised General Trevino of his intention to attack Chihuahua. He is said to have sent a letter to General Trevino on September 14 telling him that he would be in Chihuahua to shake hands with him on the 16th, and that he, Villa, hoped that Trevino would have a suitable reception for him, for he might be hungry. The Villa forces, estimated between 600 and 1,000 men, entered Chihuahua City in the early morning after Trevino and his officers had retired, following a banquet in celebration of the Mexican Independence Day. The garrisons at the penitentiary and at the two palaces which Villa captured deserted to Villa, as did from 1,000 to 1,500 Carranza troops. Villa himself is said to have addressed the people of Chihuahua City from the balcony of the palace, and to have promised to return within a few days, after which he left the city, taking with him 200 prisoners from the penitentiary and the deserting Carranza troops. American army officers doubt the story of large casualties. This raid again raised the question as to the sufficiency of Carranza's authority in northern Mexico, and may operate to delay the withdrawal of General Pershing's expedition.

FLOATING STONE. Press dispatches from Norway recently chronicled the building there of a stone vessel or barge, having ribs of steel and a hull of concrete. The first concrete boats were built in America in 1912 and 1913 at Fairfield, Md. Concrete barges have also been built for use on the Erie Canal.

Lowering a British hydroplane from a battleship in Salonica harbor

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON the western battle line, in the Picardy sector, on Friday, September 16, tho British made the most important gains of territory they have made in some weeks. Their movement began on the Albert-Bapaume road, a little north of Pozières, and extended as far east as Ginchy.

Moving northward on this line they captured the villages of Martinpuich and Flers, the farthest to the east they have yet attained; and in addition won the territory between the line of these villages and their old positions. As a result the British reached the half-way point between their original base line, from which their advance began July 1, and their objective, Bapaume. In these operations the British claim to have taken 2,500 prisoners, and from their characterization of the fighting as severe, we may assume that the casualties were very heavy.

The French also improved their encircling positions around Combles, and in a fight south of the Somme, near Belloy-en-Santerre, took a couple of hundred prisoners. On the north front of Verdun the Germans won back the positions they recently lost to the French in the Souville sector.

Further British improvement took place on that portion of their front which runs from a point a little south of the town of Thiepval to a point a little northeast of the hamlet of Courcellette, which they captured on Friday. North of Courcellette, on a line running east and west, and parallel to their old line for a thousand yards, the British advanced a short distance; and south and southeast of Thiepval along another line, running also east and west for a similar distance and parallel to the old line, they again made a small forward advance, and in so doing captured a field work at the Mouquet farm, southeast of Thiepval, on the road between that place and Pozières (whose possession has been a bone of contention between them and the Germans for some time), as well as a trench, more strongly fortified than usual, called after the Danube River.

South of the Somme the French won some local advantages on the line running from Berny to Deniecourt and from Deniecourt to Vermandovillers, and completed the capture of Vermandovillers and Berny.

The fighting on Monday, around and slightly to the east of the village of Deniecourt, was hammer and tongs. Finally the village passed entirely into the hands of the French, who also succeeded in gaining some ground to the south of this village in the direction of Ablaincourt.

The next day, Tuesday, was very quiet, as bad weather set in, which put an end to military activity. This bad weather continued Wednesday, in spite of which the Germans launched powerful counterattacks on the French line north of the Somme from Priez farm to the village of Bouchavesnes. These attacks are described as extremely violent, and were frequently renewed. At one time the Germans succeeded in gaining a foothold in the village of Bouchavesnes, but ultimately here, as elsewhere, the French succeeded in holding their original lines.

Two members of the British cabinet, Mr. Asquith and Mr. Henderson, lost sons in the fighting on the western front last week, and another British peer, Earl Feversham, has fallen.

THE king of Greece, in an interview given several days ago, but which has only just reached us, points out one fact in connection with the whole question of Greek policy which has apparently completely escaped attention heretofore, and which had never been alluded to in any cables from either Greece or London.

There are living in Turkish territory on the coasts of Asia Minor, in Constantinople and elsewhere, very large numbers of Greeks, perhaps one million, and the king points out how unfortunate their position would be in the event that Greece declared war on Turkey, when, as he says, the lives of all these Greeks would be in the gravest danger and without the possibility of any one coming to their aid or rescue.

The actual situation in Greece would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer (to use an old saying). Mr. Dimitrakopulos, designated by the king late last week, failed to form a new cabinet, and Mr. Zaimis, his predecessor, was again asked to reassume power and again declined. On Sunday a new premier was finally found in the person of a Mr. Kalogeropoulos, who succeeded in forming a cabinet and announced that while he would continue a policy of neutrality, such neutrality, as regards the Allies, would be "benevolent." This, however, was not satisfactory to the Allies, and their diplomatic representatives have adopted the policy of not recognizing the existence of this new cabinet of Premier Kalogeropoulos, and aro abstaining from paying the customary formal calls on the new minister.

A fresh complication has also arisen, to involve Greece in further trouble. When the Greek seaport of Kavala was

THE FACE OF JESUS

A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

TEXT—Matt. 17 : 2. "And his face did shine as the sun."

TONIGHT I wish to turn our meditation on the face of Jesus, as it is again and again unveiled to us in the pages of the evangelists. In the face of Jesus we may see the disposition of our God.

Here, then, is one picture of the Master's face, given us by the evangelist Mark. "Jesus looked round about on them with anger."

This is a face which perhaps we have overlooked. It is not the face that has been made familiar to us by brush and pencil. The artist has ever striven to catch the Master's face in other moods—as the Good Shepherd, as the long-suffering friend standing at the door, as he was blessing little children, or as he was warming the frozen heart of a Magdalene. But this face, the face burning with anger, they seem to have avoided. What occasioned the anger?

Here is a man with a shrunken hand, and he looks at Jesus with a mighty appeal that he would revive the helpless limb. "And Jesus, moved with compassion, called him near." Standing round about was a crowd of people, who were watching the Master with critical and unkindly eyes; and when they saw the crippled man responding to the Master's call they began to engage in secret whisperings, and to gaze upon them with assumed alarm.

And what was it all about? They did not wish to see the cripple healed because of the Sabbath day! They esteemed propriety more than goodness. They allowed their conventionalism to extinguish their humanity. They were sticklers for order, and were indifferent about life. They thought that their scrupulous care for the Sabbath was an evidence of the exquisite sensitiveness of their hearts. "No," said the Master, "it is a sign of your hard-heartedness"; and the sunshine of Jesus concentrated itself into lightning, and he looked round about on them with anger.

Now, the face of Jesus reflects the eternal disposition of God toward all who make small proprieties everything, and the healing and the redemption of the world nothing. Men sometimes listen to preachers, and they listen with critical ears, and all that they gather from the service are one or two mispronunciations, which they satirically rehearse. Propriety of pronunciation is everything, and the healing of the withered heart is nothing. Men have been known to listen to a prayer that was weighted with passion and full of tears, and then go away to criticize its grammar.

With such men, whatever their professions may be, "the Lord is angry every day."

LET us take another glimpse of the face of Jesus. "The Lord turned and looked upon Peter; . . . and Peter went out and wept bitterly."

What a face that must have been! By the silent look he breaks a fisherman's heart. It was the face of betrayed and wounded love. I say, what a face that must have been! and yet I think we are not altogether strangers to it, even in our relationship one with another.

The face of wounded affection is one of overwhelming power. If I wound a man whose relationship to me is only one of business his face will be filled with anger and revenge, and that may be endured. If I wound one of my associates, belonging to the outer circle of my friendship, he is likely to "cut me dead." That face, too, may be easily endured. But if I wound one who loves me, if I betray one whose life is inseparably intertwined with mine, and if I see that wounded love speaking in the silent face, then I am morally and spiritually dead if it do not melt me into tears.

The silent look of wounded love is the greatest power on earth or in heaven; it is the very power of the Cross. When I gaze at that face as the Master looks upon Peter, I see the very heart of God. Did I once make a vow that I would be faithful to God? Did I vow in my illness that, if I were restored to strength again, I would give my strength ungrudgingly to the Master's service? Have I done it? Did I once vow that if the Lord prospered me in business I would open my hands in bounteous liberality? Have I done it? Have I never tried to save my own skin by disowning my acquaintance with the Lord? Have I never betrayed him by my silence?

If we have betrayed and denied him, and we would like to know what the Lord still feels and thinks about it, then let us gaze upon that face of Jesus when he looks upon Simon Peter. If we could see our Father's face tonight I think it would break the hardest heart.

THE REPROACH

By Jane Burr

O MADDENED nations! Dare you face the Lord
And pray to him for victory's reward?
Rise up from where you kneel—in slime and mud!
From mangled mothers' breasts and brothers' blood!
God's answered prayers are with the glorious sun
And with the peasant when his work is done;
With little children when their dim-ples smile;
With buttercups and daisies, mile on mile.
Shall he forswear these joys of precious worth
To stride the bloody battlefields of earth?
What devil's tongue has let this madness grow—
That man should ask his God to bend so low!

"JESUS, looking back upon him, loved him." I think that face must have made the heart of the young fellow leap with a great expectancy. It is true that the Master's counsel stunned him, and made him sorrowful and depressed. But I am quite ready to believe that the oppression was only temporary, and that he soon returned and carried out the Master's word.

I am ready to believe that there was enough manly creed in the young fellow to check his depression, and that when the first shock was over he regained his feet, and applied himself to the hard and forbidding way with various decision. That face of the Master's was an inspiration and a benediction, and we may be assured that the remembrance of it gave him pluck and purpose on many a dark and cloudy day.

When I look at this face of the Master, I see what is the heart of God toward every young man or woman who is striving after the heights of the spiritual life. God, looking upon you, loves you! That is a grand word of the old psalmist when he cried: "The light of thy countenance saved me."

And so it is with the man upon whom the thought of the Saviour rests. It gives the home feeling to the missionary when he is in strange lands. It keeps the heart of all reformers young. And I say to all young men who have got their hearts fixed upon lofty spiritual eminences, and who are aspiring after the altitudes of holy truth, if they want to know how God feels toward them, let them look at the face of Jesus as he gazes upon their aspiring brother of the olden days, and in the light of that countenance they will see the eternal heart of God.

THERE is one other glimpse I will dare to reveal before I close. "Then did they spit in his face." Don't let us turn away; let us quietly look at the scene. Let us try to realize the horrible deed in all its literalness. They blindfolded this Jesus, and then, one after another, the wretched men went up to him and spit in his face!

I have sometimes wondered if any woman took part in the infamous deed. To spit upon that face, which had looked with compassion on the leper, which had rekindled the cold heart of a Magdalene, which had won the trust of the children, for them to spit upon that face!

But here again, in the face of Jesus can I see the face of God? Can I in some way do to the risen Lord what these men did to Jesus Christ? Are men spitting in the face of God today? Am I? To spit in any one's face is a sign of unspeakable contempt, and it was the contempt which wounded the Lord. We do not use the spittle now, but do we use the deeper thing, and treat the Lord with sheer contempt?

I continue the reading of this melancholy narrative, which tells me of the brutal treatment of the Christ, and I come to these words: "They bowed the knee before him, and mocked him." Have I ever done that? They stood before the Saviour, and they bowed to him as if in deep and reverent homage, and their bowing was only a cruel mockery and pretence. When we bow our heads, we appear to be saying to the Lord, "Draw near to me, my Christ! I desire to speak to thee! Draw near!" Have I ever mocked him in the approach?

Let us remember that all hypocrisy in worship is contempt of the Lord, and let us further remember that we can so cultivate the spirit of hypocrisy that in our very hypocrisy we may come to feel sincere. That is one of the most terrible of all the wages of sin.

Do not let us exhaust our indignation upon the unfeeling men of old, but let us remember that in the face of Jesus we see our God, and that we today may mete out to the risen Lord the same treatment which was inflicted upon him in the days of his flesh.

Living at Second-Hand

SUNDAY, October 8. John 18 : 34. "Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?" Was it a rumor caught in the air, or a product of personal ex rience? Did it arise in gossip, or was it born of de and private wonder? Was it from without or fr within? Was it borrowed or wrought? That is very vital issue: we can live our life on borrowed g s or on personal findings. There may be nothing o nal in our possession, nothing which is the prize of ir own secret quest, nothing which is the fruit of o own lonely travail. We can be satisfied with mere ex ence, contented to be parasites, idly sucking other p le's blood.

ut a very grim fatality attends the life which is li l at second-hand. Even when it takes the lowest fo of living on other people's money, borrowing th material means of existence, the issues are most d lly. Everything in manhood begins to soften; th moral muscles and the spiritual nerves speedily lo their robustness. The precious sense of shame d s its vital heat, and the soul becomes shameless. T man who turned crimson when he made his first b rowing, becomes the coolest cadger, and he borrows m e complacently than he worked. A man becomes a onge.

ut we can borrow other things besides money. V can borrow our convictions. But when our con- v ions are borrowed they are really not convictions a ll. They are only light opinions. They are just o r garments, which we can change at our pleasure: t y are not inner habits, woven into the very texture o ur souls. A conviction is born "of thyself." It is e ceived in the travail and toil of the spirit. A spir- i l conviction has secret relations with the Infinite. I s "rooted in Christ Jesus." It is therefore endowed w h mighty powers of endurance. It does not sicken 'hen heat cometh," but abides fresh and vigorous t ough the fiercest drought.

nd therefore it is a part of life's vital wisdom to t e borrowed facts and transform them into truth i he secret processes of personal experience. Every i erited tradition must suggest a personal explora- t n, and we must make the reverent friendship of ith as a personal discovery. "Son of man, eat this bk!" That is the way in which we must deal with our creeds, and with the deposits of other men's timony and experience. To merely accept the book o borrow a belief: to eat it is to become possessed a favor. The one is formal existence: the other is ritual life. "This is life, to know Thee!"

Praying for Those Who Rule Over Us

MONDAY, October 9. I Sam. 7 : 1-12. "Cease not to cry unto the Lard our God for us." The lmist specially mentions Samuel as among those at called on the name of God and were answered; ile Jeremiah classes him with Moses, as standing fore God. It is evident from this chapter that his temporaries trusted more in his prayers than in eir own arms. They were not very religious them- ves, but they had immense belief in prayer. We are minded of Mary Queen of Scots, who feared John nox's prayers more than the armies of the king of ngland. We are not surprised at the reputation of wer in prayer which gathered as a halo round the ly life of Samuel. His mother was a woman of ayer; his birth was an answer to prayer, and while was yet a child God himself opened the gates of his ul heavenward. The people realized how much they re indebted for his prayers, and now entreated him t to cease from an exercise which secured untold sults.

It is our duty to include our country in the scope of r daily private prayers. We must not suppose that have fulfilled our obligation if once a week in blic worship we endorse the minister's prayer for od's guidance to those in authority, and his safe- arding care. This is not enough. The interests of r fatherland are implied in the prayer that "the ingdom" may come, but we need to treat that tition explicitly if we would hasten the advent of hrist's rule in national affairs. Consider for a moment e vast influence of a great nation or city for good or il, the countless lives that are affected by the loption of this or the other policy, the advance or elay of progressive reform, and as you muse the fire ill burn, and you will be impelled to intercede as amuel did. Cast your prayer-weight into the nicely alanced scale!

Sleeping Christians

TUESDAY, October 10. Acts 20 : 9. "There sat in the window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep." I once heard of a little girl in Sunday school who was asked by her teacher, "What do you think the story of Eutychus means?" The little girl answered, "It teaches that ministers should not preach such long sermons."

To be sure, we are told that Paul's sermon on this occasion lasted until midnight, and perhaps even Paul the apostle might have been guilty of preaching too long; yet there is a parable as well as a miracle connected with this incident, and in this age when indifference to spiritual things is so common the story may bear a lesson.

Paul is repeatedly warning the early Christians of the shortness of time. "Redeem the time," he says. He cries that now it is time to awake out of sleep. "The night is far spent; the day is at hand. Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light."

In these days, when we have sent our missionaries to the ends of the earth, when "the beam that shines from Zion hill has lightened every land," right here at home we have conditions of self-indulgence, of spiritual lethargy, of ignorance of the Bible and the meaning of Christianity, that are fairly shocking at times. Rude awakenings always come to sleeping Christians; loss of dear ones, sudden poverty, wars taking homes and hopes; still we often sleep on, never realizing until death takes us that life was not made for selfish ends, but that only the man who loses his life in self-forgetting service of some kind finds it. All about us are crying wrongs to be righted, wrongs to the laborer, to the immigrant, to the home. Are we awake to do something, our share?

"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

The Value of Talking Things Over

WEDNESDAY, October 11. I Sam. 8 : 1-22. "And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord." God knew everything that had occurred, the demand of the people for a king, Samuel's reluctance, and his failure to dissuade them from their purpose; but it seemed to Samuel that he must go to and fro between the two great parties in the controversy, recounting the words of each. "He told all the words of the Lord unto the people that asked of him a king."

Here is food for thought. If we would learn the art of prayer, we must not take God's knowledge for granted, but must talk all things over with him, as we talk them over with our fellows.

At the close of their first missionary labors, we are told that the disciples gathered themselves together unto Jesus, and told him all things, whatsoever they had taught. Here is another instance of the value of talking things over with the Lord. The very telling is a relief. To rehearse what people have said and done is to take God into our confidence, to be fellow workers with him, and to see all events under the radiance of his presence. Do not matters which had ruffled us during the day assume another aspect when they are reconsidered in some holy presence of mother, wife, minister, or friend? While we are speaking and watching the expression on the dear faces, we seem to see the triviality of the incidents that offended, or the true significance of demands that puzzled us. God knows all, but he likes us to tell him all, as a child who confides in its parent, or a friend in a friend. Argue the matter out. And the Lord will give you counsel as you kneel.

Vanity and Foolish Desires

THURSDAY, October 12. Ps. 94 : 11. "Jehovah knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity." Vain men or women, according to the Bible, are "undesirables." The psalmist infers that vanity resides in a person's thoughts. It is not always something displayed—it is a quality of the soul.

Vanity and vulgarity are frequently named together and they seem to be closely associated. Vanity is liable to display itself in vulgarity. The roots of both grow in a false sense of our importance, or in a settled complacent attitude toward others, which says plainly, in the words of the Pharisee, "I thank God I am not as other men are."

Some one has said with truth that when a man cares more about his work than about himself, he cannot possibly be vulgar or vain. When the disciples John and James thought in their hearts of that high place they wanted in the heavenly kingdom, vanity had taken precedence of service; self predominated over work.

Solomon said, "Youth and the dawn of life are vanity." Youth is usually self-conscious. The remedy for vanity is to stop thinking so much of ourselves and get to work on some real task that is worth the doing. We have never seen a man whose life was afire with a great mission to be of service to some one or some thing, who was troubled with vain thoughts. The "grievous times" of which Paul spoke, when writing to Timothy, were to be known in the first place by the fact that men had become "lovers of self." Vanity in essence is selfishness.

One of our well-known public men hangs the framed words of Helen Maria Williams above the desk before which he spends a half-hour of meditation each day:

While thee I seek, protecting Power,
Be my vain wishes stilled:
And may this consecrated hour
With better hopes be filled.

The Divine Reciprocity of Prayer

FRIDAY, October 13. I Sam. 12 : 1-25. "God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you." There was every reason why Samuel should strongly resent the manner in which his people had treated him. In the case of judges like Gideon, who had rendered them great services, they had perpetuated their judgeship to the end of their lives; but in Samuel's case they demanded his abdication in favor of a king. He had walked before them from his youth. They bore willing testimony to the unselfish purity of his administration. In rejecting him, they had rejected the theocracy. He might fairly have washed his hands of so thankless a people. Why should he spend more praying-breath on them? But his noble spirit was incapable of such an attitude. Indeed he would have counted it a sin, had he ceased to pray.

In the diary of Dr. Chalmers we find this petition recorded: "Make me sensible of real answers to actual requests, as evidences of an interchange between myself on earth and my Saviour in heaven." Samuel had many answers of this sort. That very afternoon he had called for thunder and rain, and they had come. With him prayer counted for something very definite, and the people knew it. He could powerfully affect their future for good or evil, and it was a very splendid exhibition of magnanimity that he should throw the great weight of his power of achieving things through prayer on the side of a nation which had so definitely repudiated his leadership.

What Jesus Bore for Our Sakes

SATURDAY, October 14. Luke 24 : 39. "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me, and see." Pascal once said, "Jesus only let his wounds be touched after his resurrection." The hope of humanity was in Christ's scars more than in his life and teachings. His blood is our life; his wounds our plea. To the doubting world Jesus says today, "Reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side; be not faithless, but believing." Let us touch the print of the nails with the finger of faith and exclaim, "My Lord and my God!" Our hope is in his bleeding wounds. Nothing so beautiful as the scars of redemption. They will speak in never-ending eloquence through all eternity. Wounds are Christ's credentials. Millions have been sheltered in his riven side. They have identified their Saviour by the print of the nails and the bleeding brow—

O sacred Head, now wounded,
With grief and scorn weighed down!
O sacred Brow, surrounded
With thorns, thy only crown!

A young lady seeking Christ was requested by Evangelist Morehouse to. kneel and read the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, using the personal pronouns I, my and me. Soon she was sobbing bitterly, and as she read, "He was wounded for my transgressions; the Lord hath lain on him all my iniquities," she exclaimed, "Oh, Mr. Morehouse, is this true?" "Does not God say it?" he replied. "Then," she cried out, "I am saved; for all my iniquities have been laid on him, and no stroke remains for me."

Prayer and Praise

WHY should the expressions of our gratitude to God for all the benefits we receive at his hand, and for the countless blessings that have come to us during life, be confined to infrequent occasions? Is there ever a day or an hour in which we have not cause for thankfulness?

"I feel that I can never be sufficiently grateful for all the divine goodness and mercies that have come to me throughout my life," said an aged Christian lately, "and so, many a day, I just lay aside all my usual petitions and turn my prayer-time into a praise-time instead. As the years go by, I find this habit growing stronger; and now I can realize how David felt when he wrote these wonderful closing Psalms, ending with the victorious words: 'Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord!'"

Recognition of the divine goodness and hearty acknowledgment of God's mercies and blessings to our individual homes, our land and its people, are assuredly due from every one of us. Such a tribute of thankfulness is a spiritual exercise which acts as a tonic. Whether in the privacy of our chamber, or at the family altar surrounded by our dear ones, or assembled in the congregation, it is an excellent thing at times to put all our needs aside, forgetting them and even denying ourselves the privilege of making any requests for the time being, in order that our hearts may find free expression in fervent acknowledgment of God's benefits. In many churches the praise meeting is hardly known and would be an innovation worth trying. It would impress upon us God's great and abiding love and care, and our own unworthiness and forgetfulness. There are many who would gladly welcome such an opportunity. But praise is meaningless, unless we can render it with the works that flow from grateful hearts as well as with our lips. To get into a right spirit, there should be preparation by letting God so order our lives that our thoughts and actions may harmonize with our praises. Then we shall be ready to come before him acceptably with our tribute of gratitude.

Preventable Waste of Life

IN one of the publications of the Southern Sociological Congress, the "New American Chivalry" is concisely described as the championship of human welfare. This nation, it is urged, must qualify for the high distinction of world-leadership in humanity, by making war on the two greatest enemies of humanity—war and disease. It is pointed out that there are in our land 2,900,000 constantly sick, and that 630,000 die annually of preventable disease; that 250,000 babies die every year; that tuberculosis alone costs more yearly to fight than the entire cost of the Federal government; that malaria causes 3,000,000 cases of sickness every year and costs the nation $160,000,000 annually; that typhoid carries off 35,000, and that a long line of other preventable ailments adds 340,000 to the roll of incapables, at a cost of $350,000,000. If we add the ravages of hookworm with its 350,000 cases, and a long line of other preventable ailments, aggregating 340,000 more involuntary sufferers, we may form some idea of the magnitude of the task involved in fighting disease. Surely here is a better program than wasting the strength and wealth of the nation on visionary foes while real enemies within our borders and in our very homes are taking a heavier toll of human lives every year than any war has done in which we have yet been engaged.

Honoring the Pioneers of Methodism

DURING the closing months of 1916, all Methodism will be celebrating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the preaching by Philip Embury in New York City. There will also be observed, October 12 and 13, the one hundredth anniversary of the Wyandotte Indian Mission, as well as a commemoration of the centennial of the death of Bishop Asbury. It is well that the public should know more of the story of the privations and achievements of the early pioneers.

These heroic pathfinders had their headquarters in the saddle, their libraries in the saddlebags, their homes wherever night overtook them, their pulpit in a barn, on a stump or in a log cabin. They were the advance agents of civilization, the discoverers of a new world, the builders of a nation, as well as messengers of the Master. These men were the forerunners of the millions who have since found homes in the Republic. On the roll-call of these heroes we find distinguished names, such as Cartwright and Finley in the Middle West, Lee and Whitman on the Pacific Coast, and Asbury and Strawbridge in the South.

These invincible veterans of the Cross faced all dangers, suffered all privations. They were in peril of Indians and wild animals, woods and wildernesses, heat and cold, hunger and thirst. With the sky for a tentcloth and a stone for a pillow, they wrought righteousness, stopped the mouths of skeptics, waxed valiant in the fight for the spread of Christ's kingdom. They were the sent of God, though often destitute, afflicted and tormented.

With other Protestant heroes, they did for America what the Wesleys and Whitefield did for England, what Livingstone and Taylor did for Africa. They were men surcharged with a holy optimism, a spiritual dynamic. They preached the possibilities of immediate conversion, the witness of the Holy Spirit, and the pentecostal baptism of purity and power.

Today, Methodism has nearly seven millions of members and twenty million adherents throughout the world. Thirty thousand ministers are preaching the Gospel in thirty-two different languages in this country, and it is said that the sun never sets on the Methodist mission fields which now girdle the globe. The fact that there are still frontiers and opportunity for self-sacrificing devotion in the slums of our great cities demands an equally heroic ministry at the present day.

Concerning a Hughes Advertisement

Millville, N. J.

EDITOR, Christian Herald: On page 1018 of the issue of September 13th is the picture of Mr. Hughes and a strong appeal to your readers to become members of the National Hughes Alliance. Is that a paid-for advertisement, or is it your personal appeal? There is nothing to indicate that it is a political advertisement. Would you insert a similar article in behalf of such a noble Christian man as President Wilson?

Yours very sincerely,
D. H. KING, D.D.

THIS is one of several letters that have come to us from readers who, knowing the Christian Herald to be non-partisan in politics, have been doubtful whether the article in our issue of September 13 represented the views of the paper or not.

The article is a paid advertisement—neither more nor less. It presents the claims of one of the two leading candidates for the Presidency, and was paid for, accepted in the regular course of business, and published as an advertisement. We would treat the Democratic and the Prohibitionist candidates on precisely the same footing and on the same terms; that is, print their campaign announcements as paid advertisements, were they offered.

As a religious weekly publication, going into homes where every shade of politics is represented, we could not, in fairness to our readers, draw the line of exclusion at any candidate. Our friend in Millville inquires if we would insert a similar article in behalf of President Wilson. Our reply is, "Yes, unhesitatingly; or in behalf of Mr. Hanly." We do not recognize in this course any surrender of the Christian Herald's independence; but rather an evidence of its absolute impartiality.

Were There Any "Good Old Times"?

IN these progressive days, when, as our platform orators tell us, the nation is marching ahead to its destiny of greatness, we occasionally hear a note of dissent from some one who reminds us of the "good old times" and complains that, as a people, we have strayed away from the ideals of the founders of this Republic. There are others, however, who have the courage to proclaim that, according to some pretty competent authorities, the adulation of the past is greatly overdone. In an article in the Massachusetts Magazine, Raymond B. Fosdick, former Commissioner of Accounts of New York City and a painstaking student of those early times which we usually gild with our idealism, comes to the rather startling conclusion that "there were no good old days," and that the picture has been largely an imaginary one. He quotes John Adams, the patriot, as writing that the Continental Congress during the Revolution was "inefficient and the rage for office was great; Congress was torn to pieces by disputes over spoils." In the Congress in 1778 there were "scenes of venality" which would imply the presence of the primal pork-barrel. Washington himself wrote of the Continental Congress that "party disputes and personal quarrels were the great business of the day." It may have been that during these stormy times the ideals of the fathers had t ye crystallized. Still searching for "the good old ays," Mr. Fosdick comes to the Constitutional Con ntio of 1787, an eventful period in our history. ne the "fathers," writing at that time, said: "T leav the choice of the chief magistrate to the peopl voul be as unnatural as to leave the choice of colo to blind man," a sentiment not altogether appr ativ of popular government, nor of the good sens f th nation. "The people," said Alexander Ham on i an argument before the Constitutional Con tior "are turbulent and changing; they seldom j ge o determine right. Nothing but a permanent bo y ca check the imprudence of democracy." E ridg Gerry of Massachusetts struck a similar n , de claring, "The people do not want virtue, but e th dupes of pretended patriots." But here th criti seems to have overlooked the fact that the A rica nation was then in the making, and it was eces sarily a period of intellectual conflict. Th grea oaks were then little more than seedlings, to d by every breeze. The franchise was jealously re icte to the wealthy and wellborn, and was guar d by property and religious qualifications. M hoo suffrage came long afterward. New Ham shire New Jersey, North Carolina, South Caroli an Georgia had rigid religious restrictions a ctin the beliefs of gubernatorial candidates, and assa chusetts and Maryland were almost equally trict In some other states, none but the truly or odo could hold any office. Yet, in spite of all the pre cautions, politics was far from being free fro graf and corruption.

Human nature was pretty much the same t n a it is today. Politics as a whole has been disc litec by countless abuses, from the "good old day" u to the present time. It is only in comparati re cent years that popular education has rais the intelligence of the masses to a point where the om prehend the evil and have a vision of the good.

We have traveled a good deal in the right di tion since the "good old days"; the standard of blic service has been elevated and many old-time uses made well-nigh impossible. We have dropped m h of the rancor that formerly marked political cam gns, just as we have eliminated many features tha were discreditable in our social and civil life. The tion is ascending to loftier heights and living in a urer atmosphere; its outlook is better and nobler t n in the old days of stress and turmoil.

But, after all, it is a pity to assail the tradit ns of the "good old days," no matter if they are l gely idealistic. Distance lends enchantment to the ures in the background of American history, and f the sake of what our forefathers accomplished pite the storms and snares and temptations of thei lay, we can well afford to remember only the good s of heart, the broad statesmanship, the splendid co age and high spirit of those men who molded the mes in which they lived, and whose prevision of hat was to come after was almost supernatural. t is doubtful, after all, whether their descendants ould have done half as well.

IS there anything new under the sun? Ma of the modern arts and sciences had their begi ing in a far-off age, when the brain of some or nal thinker of that early time conceived an idea ich was not perfected till long afterward. The rac has always been creative, searching out new wa of accomplishing things, and showing new glimp of new methods which the trained minds of a late me adopted and developed and brought into genera use.

Some industrious archeologist, rummaging a ong the musty inscriptions in one of the great Eur ean museums, found a strip of papyrus which still ore faint traces of the writing of an Egyptian scri of 5,000 years ago. On being deciphered it prov to be the advertisement of a landholder of Egypt f the recovery of a runaway slave. It is doubtles the oldest advertisement in the world, or at leas the earliest that has yet come to light. That faded s oll, written with the reed called "kash," dipped i an ink that has now lost all trace of its original or, was the germ, the parent idea of one of the gre est businesses the world has ever known—a bus ess which now yields a revenue sufficient to buy the nd of the Pharaohs outright. That strip of pap us, circulating from hand to hand within a restr ed radius, was the forerunner of the far-reaching a er tising sheet of today which circulates everyw re. Unfortunately for the advertising men of today, ho would have immortalized his memory, the nam of the Egyptian scribe cannot be known.

A Royal Fish Car

THE Railway Review of a recent date gives a description of a special car fitted up by the United States Bureau of Fi eries to transfer spawn and fish fr one part of the nation to another. T special car made 146,000 miles of avel last year. The construction is tost modern and within is every ec pment for efficient work. At one er is the office, with desk, cl t, berths and various in uments for the chief. T center of the car is de- vo d to the water tanks, ice, ar fish tanks, and living rc s for the crew, while at th other end is the kitchen an the boiler room. A very ec plete system of piping in res the proper regulation of emperature at all times ar places. Fish are distrib- u in every state of the U on, some 10,000 individual ap ications being filed every y . As a result of trans- p ting, the Atlantic shad ar striped bass are abundant or he Pacific coast, and cer- t depleted salmon rivers of Maine have been planted w the humpbacked salmon fr the Pacific. The fish s ply now and at any period o the world's history will h e much to do in solving tl food question of the race. C government deserves great c lit for its wisdom and e iency in the Fisheries De- p ment. Fish was an im- p ant article of diet among t Hebrews, as among many o r nations, ancient and n lern. "Now as he walked b the Sea of Galilee he saw S on and Andrew his brother c ing a net into the sea; for they w e fishers. And Jesus said unto t n, Come ye after me, and I ill make you to become fishers o en." (Mark. 1 : 16, 17.)

Doctor Flies to Patient

HURRY call for help came to a Long Island doctor the other day. T e patient was across the bay, seven i es away, with no sailboat available. T e physician remembered that there w a hydroaeroplane nearby, and he r uisitioned it for the errand of mercy, r ching his patient safely in about s en minutes. The return was made w hout accident. It is a pleasure to r lize that although every resource o science is now being pressed into the s vice of destruction of property and h nan life, the necessities of war have n ertheless hurried on the advance- m nt of science in many fields, by more t n a century, within these couple of y rs, and when the war is over there w l be a vastly improved equipment for w rks of mercy and the saving of human l . Peace and goodness will yet claim t ir return for the losses of the pres- e , and the instruments and imple- m nts now thought of as the servants o death shall be the equally ready s vants of their new master in the era o peace and mutual helpfulness that i o come. This was the vision of the o prophet of Israel. "They shall beat t ir swords into plowshares, and their s ars into pruning-hooks." (Isa. 2:4.)

Irish Ask for Prohibition

T is said that the longest petition ever presented to the English Par- ment arrived from Ulster County, Ireland, the other day. It was two and one-half miles long, and bore the signatures of 116,000 persons, who asked for the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors for the term of the War and at least six months thereafter in Great Britain. The English colonies are closely rivaling the United States in their war on the liquor traffic. Canada is almost entirely dry. Only recently the province of Ontario, containing the beautiful city of Toronto, was made dry by governmental action as a war measure for three years, and at the expiration of that time, in 1919, the people will be allowed to settle the question permanently by vote. The principle illustrated by Daniel's decision was expressed by the Irish petition: "But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor the wine which he drank." (Dan. 1 : 8.)

Mission to Blond Eskimos

THE tribe of blond Eskimos which Harry V. Radford of New York, the murdered explorer, reported he had found at Coronation Bluff, far in the Arctic Zone, have again been visited by a white man. In a letter received the other day from the Rev. H. Girling of Immanuel College by the Rev. Dr. Carpenter, principal of the college, the missionary announced that he reached the fire-dwellers of the Arctic on October 10, 1915, and remained with them some time. He asserts that he is the first white man to dwell among the new-found people who since their discovery have been such a mystery. The letter was written last December from Camp Necessity, ten miles from the blond tribe, the first of whom, the missionary said, he found about ten miles east of Cockburn Point. Mr. Girling said that a great deal had already been accomplished in the direction of vocabulary and grammar, the fair-skinned race having only a dialect different from the Mackenzie River Eskimos. There are peoples of all colors and minds of all types, but they are all children of a common Father, and are our brothers, with corresponding obligations. The divine Fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of the human race are taught in Paul's sermon on Mars Hill—a sermon in which the whole of our modern doctrine of international brotherhood is contained in a nutshell. "He hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." (Acts 17 : 26.)

Floods Leave Well Standing

THE recent floods that devastated parts of North Carolina left many curious remains of their destructive work behind them. One of the freaks of the flood is the well seen in the picture. It was so well built that when the earth was washed away around it, the wall still stood, though undermined to a depth of about 35 feet. It remains a monument to the splendid workmanship of the builder and a reminder of the surrounding land as it was before everything was changed by the onrushing waters. Jesus taught that the floods are a testing of foundations and workmanship. The man who built on a rock feared neither rains nor torrents, while the sand foundation gave way destroying the house built upon it. So with this well. It was dug and the wall built under ordinary conditions, and no one expected that it would be put to such a severe test. But the builder did his work faithfully, and the wall though unseen was stout and fairly made. When the testing came it stood, even without the natural support of the ground about it. Amid the chaos of the surrounding devastation it stands, reaching down still for the pure, clear waters in the earth, and bringing cheer and refreshment to thirsty throats. A good well is about as blessed a providence as any provided for man in its constant ministrations of drink and cleansing. The Hebrews in their desert experiences learned the value of the old wells that for centuries had supported man and beast in the midst of the scorching and famishing sands. Even down to Jesus' day the well dug by Jacob was a source of blessing to its nearby village, and by this cool, deep, pure well he preached that great sermon to the woman of Samaria, in which he gave the promise for all men and all ages, that he would come into the human heart through the deserts of life and keep it supplied with joy and power. "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up unto eternal life." (John 4 : 14.)

Remorse too Great

JUDGE HENRY V. FREEMAN, for twenty-five years justice of the Superior Court in Chicago, has just died, largely, his family says, as a result of grief over the fact that twenty years ago he sentenced to the penitentiary for life three men who he later became convinced were innocent. After years of effort to have them released he finally saw two of them let out on parole about a year ago, the third one having died in prison. But the strain had been too much for Judge Freeman, and he succumbed to the long years of worry. The tender conscience of this high-minded judge is typical of the lofty motives that dominate most of our judiciary. As a class our judges are men for a nation to be proud of, and though there are instances where their judgments are wrong and injustice may be done instead of justice, yet the whole system of our courts is a noble one, and not the least of the fundamental defenses of our commonwealth. The respect for law and the moral character of its judges is a good test of any country's strength. From the first God inculcated upon the minds of the Jewish people the dignity and importance of the work of their judges, as we see in the following Mosaic law: "If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment thou shalt come unto the judge that shall be in those days, and inquire, and thou shalt do according to the sentence, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do." (Deut. 17 : 8-11.)

Farm Boy Cavaliers

THE Farm Boy Cavaliers is the name of a new organization forming throughout Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin and Canada among the growing boys on farms. The purpose is to develop manhood and character through useful activities, and the program calls for special work in growing crops, raising live stock, operating farm machinery, carpentry and cement work, keeping farm accounts, photography, guarding public health and eradicating farm pests. The extension departments of the universities are cooperating in the work of training the boys. A horse, a uniform and frequent meetings on horseback are some of the features that appeal to the romance in the lad's nature. Yeomen, pages, esquires and knights are the four ranks that make up the order, and one must qualify for each by suitable tests. Knighthood has always had a charm for a growing boy, and there is in the heart of a healthy lad something that answers to the best of the old feudal chivalry. To dignify and illuminate the work of the farm, which to the mind of many a boy is simple drudgery, is a worthy object, and still better is it to instil into his mind the feeling that he is bound by honor to a true chivalry of character that shall express itself in doing faithfully his work each day, in helping others, and in harboring no base or mean thought. The all-round development of such lads will show in the coming years when as men they take up in this same spirit the duties of life. We have a most beautiful description of the unfolding character of the young Knight of Nazareth. "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." (Luke 2 : 52.)

Modern Life in Syria

IN a report to the National Geographic Society, John D. Whiting presents the results of careful study of the farming conditions in Syria and Palestine of today. Almost every sentence illustrates some Biblical picture of life in the Promised Land, for there is nothing modern in Syria, but just the same old conditions that have prevailed for thirty centuries. Fences are unknown; the land is frequently owned in common by the people of a village, and redistributed every second year by lot. The "latter rain" begins to fall about November after a rainless summer, and then plowing begins. The plow is a rude affair of wood, the bent parts being the natural curve of the tree. It is pulled by oxen, or sometimes by a cow, donkey or camel. In harvest time the whole family has a share in the work, even the children taking their play to the field. Even as in the days of Ruth, so today the reapers are careful to leave a little for the gleaners. Patient animals still tread out the corn. When the grain is harvested the grape crop is ready and the whole family transfers its activities to the vineyard. Then in the fall the olives are harvested. The Old Testament is full of references to the farming and herding life of the people, and especially to their joy in the harvest and the first ripe fruits. "They joy before thee according to the joy in harvest." (Isa. 9 : 3.)

What's in a Name?

The query is centuries old—the answer ever new.

For the Bard himself did not give an adequate answer, though cleverly he seemed to do so.

There may be everything in a name—or nothing.

Depending entirely on whether or not there is an ideal, a purpose and a will back of the name.

Names die or endure—they get their deserts.

In recent times men seem to have overlooked that fact—that inevitable reward for good or ill.

Names in our day, are, alas, too ofte the sacrifice of the name.

To such an extent is this true, you who read this have come to know and to regard the Reo product as "The Gold Standard of Values" in automobiles and motor trucks.

It is our ambition to so conduct this business that, as the years go by, you will not find reason to change, but will be the more strongly confirmed in that good opinion of Reo.

Waiting for a Car

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I WAS waiting for a car a few days ago. It was the morning that a strike was being declared, but I did not realize that. Although I was only a short walk from my office, I waited. "For," I reasoned, "I am in a hurry to get to work this morning. And if I take a car I shall get there much more quickly than I shall if I walk."

I waited for five minutes, but no car came. "But," I thought to myself, "it will come any minute now." I waited five minutes longer, and still it didn't come. Desperately I realized that I could have walked over, comfortably, in ten minutes. But still I waited, repeating in my mind, "There has been some small accident. The car will come any minute now."

At the end of fifteen minutes I decided not to wait any longer. And I set out briskly, walking across the city. Up to the time I reached the Bible House there was no car in sight. And then I realized that I had wasted time in waiting because "the car might come any minute!"

WALK AHEAD

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

IF yer want ter get ter somewheres,
Walk ahead!
Don' yer loiter by the roadside Playin' dead.
Walk, an' whistle when yer walkin';
Smile, an' do some friendly talkin',
An'you'll get there without balkin'!
It's been said
That a tortoise, fat an' funny,
Beat a real swift-movin' bunny,
When they raced ter win some money;
An' I read
That he did it 'cause he follered,
While the bunny slep' an' wollered
In the roadside. Fer the tortoise Walked ahead!

IT'S mighty easy to wait for anything, and many of us do it, instead of walking ahead and reaching the destination sooner. It's the old Hare and Tortoise game played over again in real life.

There were once two men—clever men with quite remarkable business ability. Each of them wanted to go into business for himself, but they were comparatively poor men, and starting a business necessitates capital.

The first man went to work in the office of a firm who were in the line that he wanted to enter some day. He started very near the bottom of the ladder at a small salary.

The other man? Well, the other man didn't want to start at the bottom of the ladder. "I'm rather clever," he reasoned to himself; "why should I start doing what any unskilled man can do? Why should I throw away my life slaving at a tiny salary? I have a rich uncle who will die some day and leave me his money. When he does I shall use it as capital, and start a business of my own."

The first man plodded along, rising gradually up the ladder, step by step. And the other man waited for the uncle to die so that he might get enough money to start out for himself. He did enough work to earn the necessities of life, but his work was not consistent—he never kept at anything long enough to do it really well.

The first man, rising step by step, finally gained a place of great importance in the company. He also acquired a large bank account. And then, one day, he approached the president of his concern, and, "Well," he said, "I think that I'll break away, now, from this company. You've been mighty good to me, but I can't help feeling that I'd like to start in for myself. I've got enough money to finance my ideas."

The president of the concern leaned forward. Suddenly he spoke. "We don't want to lose you," he said abruptly. "You've worked your way up and you have become a valuable man. Why not put your money into our firm? It's a good one, you know that! We'll take you into partnership."

And so the man, instead of starting out on a new and possibly hard road, found a comfortable place all ready for him.

The second man waited for the uncle to die. He waited complacently, almost. And then the uncle, suddenly deciding that he would like to die a multimillionaire, began to plunge into the stock market. In two months all his capital was absorbed, and he died—a broken old man! The nephew, being the only relative, had to pay the funeral expenses. That left him completely penniless, at an age when most men were just beginning to reach the goal.

The first man was a success because he went ahead and walked—because he didn't wait for the help that might be just around the corner. The second man was a failure because he waited for a car and kept saying, "Why walk? It will come any minute now."

I KNOW a girl who has made a great success of teaching school. Her class is a large one, and her pupils come from the tenement district of a great city. It is hard for a girl to creep into the hearts of children, but she has managed to make them love her devotedly.

"How did you do it?" I asked her one day.

The girl laughed softly, and lo ed at me as she might have looke at puzzled child. It's a habit with er.

"My dear, don't ask me such a olis question," she answered. "I c ldn help getting along with them. But think really that they like me cau I took the first step."

"The first step?" I repeated nkly "the first step?"

"The children," the girl to m "resented me a bit—at first. The didn't love my pretty dresses a l m clean finger nails and my nea hai They weren't used to it, I suppo

"I might have waited all y r fo them to like me, but I didn't. or wanted them to like me—at on S the second day of school I stopp at little shop and bought candy- tick pink candy. I brought it to hoo and after the opening exercises too up behind my desk, and said:

"'Now, children, let's get acqu nte I like you and I want you to l me Will you?' And I smiled at thei hare and they answered back, every ne c them, 'Sure we will!' And then I asse the pink candy."

IT'S so easy to wait for a car- hat ever that car may stand for, nd i may stand for anything from suc s a the way up to friendship and po arit and love. It's too easy to sa will be along in a moment. I around the corner."

It's all right if the car is just own the corner! But sometimes i isn Sometimes there's been a wrec or strike. Sometimes it just isn't r ning Sometimes it may have stopped r nin for always!

Walk ahead, and if your car ome you can board it at the next cor r. I it doesn't come you'll get som here anyway. But if you wait you'll st b standing still, and standing still is ot in spiring to the mind or the heart or t soul

The Iowa Bands of 1842 and of Today

By
DWIGHT P. BREED, Ph.D

IN 1842, when Iowa was a territory on the far western fringe of American civilization, the members of the middle class of Andover Theological Seminary were praying and planning for their life work. They were of heroic stuff, those students. They did not cast lingering eyes upon the easy pastorates of old New England, but they turned their faces westward, toward the open country where the pioneers wrestled with the Indian and the blizzard and the forest, but often forgot to wrestle with prayer. They corresponded with the Home Missionary agents in various Western states, and early in 1843 it was decided that a company of them should go to some new state to pioneer together for the Lord. It was hard to choose, but at length one of them said, "Well, I am going to Iowa, whether any one else goes or not." Ten of his classmates joined him, and they agreed that "if each one of them would be able to plant one permanent church and all together plant a Christian college in Iowa their lives would be well spent." This was the first "Iowa Band."

In Iowa at this time were eight Congregational ministers and fourteen organized churches. The Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Episcopalians also had begun work in the territory, and the circuit rider had penetrated even to the ragged bluffs of the raging Missouri; but there were little towns constantly springing up at fords and crossroads, and sturdy farmers from Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New England were entering the territory by hundreds to take up homesteads on the waiting prairies. There was need for much ministry. The men on the field were each doing the work of ten, yet the immediate need grew with every week.

They were not a godless lot, these pioneers, neither were they all saints. Many a later church had its beginnings in a farmer's family prayers, and many a life that had come to Iowa with much promise measured a failure through forgetting God. It was a wide-open country. The glass and the gaming table had equal rights with the parson; and the fact that the parson finally won is due, in no small part, to the coming of those eleven men to Iowa just when they came. The advent of the Iowa Band was a most notable event in the Christian history of the state. Vigorous men, college-trained, they came as sufficient reinforcements to the cause of Christ, and each threw himself ardently into the work to which he had dedicated his life. It was not long before each had his church, and several of them founded many churches before their active ministry was ended.

Busy as these men were with the work of their immediate ministry, they did not forget the Christian college which they had planned to found. In 1846 five of them were together as usual talking about the project. One of them took a dollar from his pocket, and laying it on the table said: "This is the beginning of the endowment fund of the college; now appoint a Board of Trustees to take care of the funds." The Home Missionary pastor in whose study they were met went to his scanty library, and picking out six books laid them beside the dollar, saying: "And this is the beginning of the College Library. Now appoint Trustees to take charge of the funds and the books." These challenges were promptly met, and Grinnell College came into existence. The characters, lives and services of the Iowa Band have been recognized by governors, statesmen, historians, and religious bodies through all the years. No equal number of men in any walk of life made anything like their contribution to the character and life of the state.

THE persistency and power of the spirit of the original Iowa Band have had most positive evidence very recently in the establishing of the "Grinnell-China" educational and missionary movement which is carried on through the regularly organized channels of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. This movement has been in operation for three years. It is sustained by the college faculty and students, the alumni and the local Congregational Church and Women's Missionary Society. To date it has maintained fifteen day schools, a boarding-school for boys, and a girls' boarding-school. The annual cost of the work thus far has been about four thousand dollars. Recently an Educational Director has been appointed to have supervision over these schools.

President Main, two members of Grinnell faculty, and eight members of the present Iowa band (now in China)

The work of higher education for the fifty million population of the province of Shantung is to be done by the Shantung Christian University, located at Tsinanfu and supported by all the Christian denominations v king in that part of China. This uni rsity maintains four departments: bera Arts, Normal, Medical and Tl logical. The Grinnell-China plan p ides for three professorships in this iver sity, with provision for residen s for thos who hold hem and n endov nent for eir per nent sup rt, as well s for the ous ing and sup t of the Edu cat nal Di tor. Fo the ope tion of his spl did pla a ba of elev men has been sel ted f m amo the Gri ell grad tes. This new twe e h cen ur " I wa Ban will soon e at wo in the han tung rov ince, filled with the same spir and animated by like ambitions to hose which made the nineteenth c ury Iowa Band so great a force fo ood in the making of Iowa. The Chicago of Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

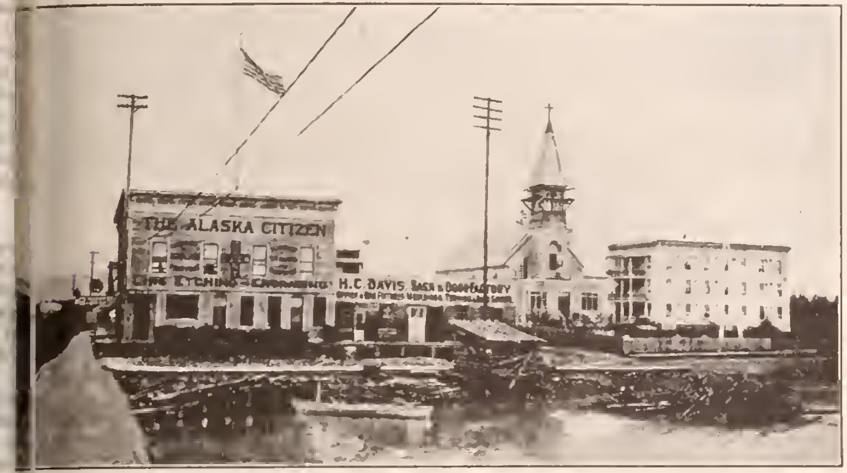
Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

FAIRBANKS is the Chicago of Alaska, the future metropolis in the heart of the territory. It is to be the terminus of Uncle Sa s new railway, the point where the riv and rail navigation will center an oin. The town might bo called the hu of Alaska. It is almost equidistant bet een Bering Sea and the interna- tio l boundary, and very nearly half wa between the Pacific and tho Arctic Oc ns. It lies well up on the globe and ts titude is 65 degrees north. If you th d draw a line through Fairbanks ru ng around the world, it would rc the Seward Peninsula about a hu red miles or more north of Nome, wo l go through Bering Strait and cut Sib ia almost in half. Thence it wo l go on through Russia 300 miles no of Petrograd, and through Nor- wa and Sweden at about the same dis nce north of Christiania and Stock- ho . It would run through the center of eland and cross Greenland several hu red miles north of its southernmost po . It would go through the upper pa of Hudson Bay, and over the wildest art of the Dominion of Canada, rc ing the international boundary not far om where it is cut by the Yukon.

ave come to Fairbanks via the Yu- ko There are three routes by which th own is reached from the outside. Th first involves a thousand miles by oce steamer from Seattle to Skagway, 11 miles by rail over the White Pass to the ead of the navigation of the Yu- ko at White Horse, and from there jus about 1,500 miles down that river an p the Tanana to Fairbanks. An- ot route is from Seattle to Nome and St. ichael, at the mouth of the Yukon, acr s the Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea. Th is 2,700 miles long, and one has to tra l 1,100 miles more up the Yukon Ri before he gets here. The first trip tak ten or twelve days, the second, wit the stoppages necessary, from two we s to a month, and both must be ma in the summer, when navigation is en. The third route is by ship fro Puget Sound to Valdez or Cor- do on Prince William Sound, and the e here across country by dog sled or automobile. The last route is the sh er, but much more expensive. Wh the railroad is finished the trip to irbanks will be made in four or fiv lays, and the cost will be greatly rec ed. The town will then be one of e traffic points on the map of the wo l.

irbanks is at the junction of the rai ay and river navigation of the ter ory. This does not mean that the to lies on the Yukon. Alaska is a lar of great rivers, and the Yukon has ma large navigable tributaries. One of ese is the Tanana, a stream more th 600 miles long. It is on a branch of Tanana that Fairbanks is located, an that within 280 miles of where it flo into the Yukon. It took me two days to come up the Tanana River from Fort Gibbon to Fairbanks. The Tanana is navigable for some distance above Fairbanks, and its valley has millions of acres of agricultural land. It is in this valley that Fairbanks lies.

The place is also in the heart of large areas of gold-bearing gravel. The railroad, now building, will tap coal fields near Fairbanks, and the cheap fuel will make a revolution in mining, both placer and quartz.



A section of Fairbanks' shore front and sky line

FAIRBANKS of today has a municipal entity of its own, and a delightful individuality. It is a combination of the picturesque and the plain, of the shabby and the sumptuous, of the old and the new, and in all it is different.

The main business street is a wide dirt road with plank sidewalks, from which riso frame buildings of one and two stories. The front walls of the stores extend high above the roofs and are cut off horizontally to make them look taller. The sky-line is a jagged saw. The stores are wholesale and retail. They have plate-glass windows, and the assortment within them is of every description. Fairbanks is the trading center of interior Alaska, and goods from here go to the mining camps of the Tanana, the Yukon, the Koyukuk and the Innoka rivers, on the last of which is the Iditarod gold camp. The town has large warehouses of galvanized iron and some of its wholesale firms do a business that runs into the millions. It has machine shops and a sawmill. It exports and imports, and steamers are always lying at anchor just off the main business street.

Fairbanks is typical of its surroundings. The goods in the stores are of their own kind. There are establishments filled with mining machinery, and stores carrying all sorts of goods for miners, including mackinaws and the khaki suits used in tho wilds. They sell boots of white rubber, which reach to the waist, and hob-nailed shoes fitted for tramping over the rocks and making your way though the brush. They have also silks and broadcloths and shoes of fashionable makes, such as are worn in New York, Paris and London. They have moccasins beautifully beaded. Entering the banks, you will see them taking in gold dust at one window and handing out bank notes at another. Every bank buys gold, and all have their assaying and melting establishments, where the metal is tested and made into bricks to be shipped outside. The town has plenty of lawyers and good physicians and dentists.

Tho traffic is interesting. The crowds on the streets include men and women as well dressed as those of any city east of tho Alleghanies, and miners clad in blue jeans or khaki. Well-blacked shoes go along side by side with rough boots that lace almost to the knees. There are crowds of men in their shirt-sleeves on tho street corners. They wear soft hats or sombreros.

Now turn your eyes to the roadways. See those great drays hauling hay and oats to the steamers. Each has a load worth two or three hundred dollars, for hay brings one hundred dollars a ton and other feed is proportionately high. See tho automobiles of various makes and the motor trucks carrying heavy articles of one kind or another. There aro scores of motor vehicles away up here in this heart of Alaska, and jitney buses go regularly each day to the gold-bearing creeks. There is an overland stage that makes the trip from Fairbanks to Chitina, the terminus of the Copper River Railroad. By it one can motor more than three hundred miles through the wilds, and then have a two-hundred-mile railroad ride down to the sea. In the winter there are many dog sleds with long teams of dogs, and there are sleds drawn by horses that take the place of the automobiles in making the trip out of the country.

"I made this cake with Crisco at half the cost of butter"

THIS message has an appeal for every woman. It points the way toward cutting down household expenses.

You need not bake less just because creamery butter is high. Use Crisco.

Crisco is a purely vegetable shortening of such superior quality that it gives butter richness. Yet it costs only half as much.

CRISCO
For Frying · For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco-made cakes are as tasty as if the best creamery butter were used and they stay fresh and moist much longer.

Crisco is all shortening, purely vegetable, the solid cream of edible oil, and so rich that one-fifth less is required.

You can save money and enjoy appetizing results by following the example of the American housewives who already use Crisco in their cakemaking.

Emily's White Cake
(Kate B. Vaughn)
As rich and tasteful as if you used butter costing twice as much

¾ cupful Crisco
2¼ cupfuls sugar
4½ cupfuls flour
4½ teaspoonfuls baking powder
1½ teaspoonfuls salt
1½ cupfuls milk or water
1½ teaspoonfuls flavoring whites of 5 eggs
(Use accurate level measurements)

Cream Crisco. Add sugar slowly and cream together. Sift dry ingredients and add alternately with liquid. Add flavoring then beat mixture well before folding in the egg whites. Prepare layer cake tins by greasing them with a mixture of Crisco and flour. Pour in cake mixture, put in moderate oven, allow to rise for five minutes, increase heat and bake fifteen minutes, reduce heat to allow cake to shrink from sides of pan. Sufficient for three large layers.

Chocolate Frosting

4 cupfuls granulated sugar
2 cupfuls milk
8 tablespoonfuls cocoa or 4 squares chocolate
2 tablespoonfuls Crisco
1 teaspoonful vanilla
(Use accurate level measurements)

Mix sugar and cocoa together, add milk and cook until you can form a soft ball in cold water. Cool, then beat until creamy, add Crisco and continue beating. When quite cold beat in vanilla. As soon as thick enough to spread, spread between layers and on top of cake. If chocolate is used in place of cocoa add to sugar and milk and it will melt as syrup cooks.

You should send for Janet McKenzie Hill's new book "Balanced Daily Diet". It is a handsome addition to the Crisco Library. Illustrated in color. Contains many new economical recipes. Tells how to best prepare meals for greater physical and mental strength. A storehouse of valuable household information including the interesting Story of Crisco. Sent for five 2-cent stamps. Worth much more. Write today. Address Dept. S-10, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, O.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leag e

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

WIDE as is the territorial sweep of the daily session of the Christian Herald Prayer League, the individual requests for prayer and testimonies to answered prayer that are presented through the medium of the Christian Herald mail are as humanly real, earnest and convincing as are the same testimonies and requests at the mid-week prayer meeting of every village church. The writers of these letters speak without reserve and as though in the presence of friends who are assembled together with confidence that, where two or three are gathered together in his name, he himself will be in the midst.

"I am glad to say," writes one member (and you can almost hear the tremble of her voice at that word glad), "that God has answered prayer in the case of a man and wife who had become estranged and are now reconciled, and the family are living happily together. The father seems to have entirely quit drinking, which was the cause of their trouble." And then this writer goes on to confide that some boys whose names she sent to the Prayer League are still unconverted. "Pray a little harder, so this will come to pass also," is the request.

Now another member of the League (we are quoting from these letters one by one, exactly as individuals might rise and speak in a prayer meeting, tells of her son who is facing an operation, and asks for prayer for his safety. The writer gives thanks for work that has come to the husband in answer to prayer. The next gives joyful praise because "a darling boy" has come safely through an attack of scarlet fever. She asks prayers for the salvation of her husband.

The next begs us almost with marks of tears upon her letter to please pray for a mother and tuberculous son, and for the financial help that is needed until this son is strong enough to be a bread-winner. This friend asks the League to pray that the hearts of other children of this same mother may be moved to come to the aid of the afflicted son.

Another friend tells us quite frankly and at the same time trustfully, "Some of my prayers have been answered quite differently to what I expected, but in a much better way, and I will never doubt again that God does answer prayer." This friend asks for our prayerful interest in her sister, "a bright and useful young woman, who is afflicted with epilepsy."

It rests with the members of the Prayer League to invest the condensed statements of requests for prayer that appear here each week, with the living voices of the petitioners. The space is all too limited to give the substance or even a small percentage of the weekly mail. Members of the League do not know personally those who make up the "twenty-seven friends," or whatever may be the number, who ask prayers for recovery of health, or the forty who ask for revival of religion in their communities, or the score or more who are agonizing over troubles they would have us take upon our hearts; it is enough to know that our fellov Chri tians, almost without numbe hav turned to the Christian Herald ray League in their needs and are s ngth ened in their hope by the knowle e tha they are being prayed for by tl grea company of believers, and every mb of the League will take cour ar press on in faith, because of tl test monies of answered prayer whi com from so many friends, thoug the names and their personalities ca not known to us all.

An Eye-Witness of War's Ravages

A WEEK or so before leaving Vienna to come to America I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Julian Romanczuk, president of the Christian Herald Relief committee, and two other members. I saw many letters and petitions from needy people, letters of thanks, and other records of the excellent work accomplished by the committee.

Mr. Romanczuk is a vice-president in the Austrian Parliament, representing the Austrian Ukrainians (Ruthenians). He requested me very earnestly to express to the Christian Herald and its readers the warmest thanks for the generous help rendered to the poverty-stricken widows and orphans of the war zone in Austria. The American people, he said, had been exceedingly kind and magnanimous in extending help and sympathy to those who were suffering through the present war.

From my whole talk with the members of the committee, I gathered that they desire me to bring to your attention the following three points: 1. That the branch of the New York Christian Herald Relief Fund in Vienna was becoming more widely known daily; many influential Austrian journals had printed in different languages appreciative accounts of its work and the aid it is bringing to the widows and helpless orphans of the war. This was especially the case in the journals from Galicia and Bukowina. The number of petitions is steadily increasing. 2. The committee wished me to tell you that thus far they have been giving help exclusively to widows and orphans and only to such as could prove that they belong to that class. 3. The third point concerning which the committee desired me to inform the Christian Herald concerns the Ukrainian people in the governments of Volhynia and Cholm, who have been great sufferers owing to the war. When the Russians were retreating, they took away with them nearly all of the male population, leaving only gray-headed men and the women and children. The villages are burned, people living in dens, the fields trampled by cavalry, nowhere a single cow or horse to be seen, a population starving from sheer hunger, and epidemics carrying off many victims—such is the picture painted by those who have visited these unfortunate territories.

Before concluding, let me add a few words further of my own experiences. The war caught me in the Carpathian Mountains, at a little village called Dora, which is a summer resort. It lies in the eastern part of the range, in the vicinity of Nadwirna and Kolomea. There I remained, either in the village or hiding in the mountains with the peasants, until it was impossible longer to fight the cold and hunger, and the food we received from the soldiers was insufficient to keep us alive. While in the mountains I witnessed scenes the recollection of which still brings tears to my eyes. At the outbreak of the war, practically all the male population was taken away to the army, and the women, being unable to take care of the cattle, sold them to the army, believing they themselves could buy whatever they should need, and that the railroad would bring the necessary supplies. But the armies, one after another, passed the Carpathians. Almost all of the villages were depopulated, the people fleeing to the mountains, leaving their possessions behind, and these were taken away by the soldiers, while the houses were either burned or demolished by artillery fire. The railroads ceased to operate, and when the refugees returned to the villages they found only ashes and ruins where their homes had once stood. It would be impossible for me to describe their sufferings then; they lived chiefly on dried fruits or roots which they dug up. It was a time of horrible starvation!

I was in Lemberg, then under Russian occupation. I went to a village about 50 kilometers north of Lemberg, witnessing meanwhile the great German offensive of 1915, which began on the River Dunajec. Galicia on the whole has undergone an experience that will never be told in words. In my opinion, she is one of the provinces that have suffered worst of all in the present war. In many villages fully half the houses are destroyed by fire, while other villages are wholly burned down. Still others are depopulated by epidemics. Starvation and smallpox did their work in these places and are still doing it. In Galicia and Bukowina the people have no money to buy food. Four times the conflicting armies passed over these provinces, always doing damage and carrying something off. The land is a cemetery—a land of graves, of want, poverty, hunger and disease. Every little help they can receive is precious to them. A dollar sent there through your Relief Committee at the right time may mean at least one life saved.

The Appeal to Cæsar

International Sunday School Lesson for October 15. Acts 25

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

"It is enough for the disciple that he be as his teacher, and the servant as his lord."
Matt. 10 : 25

We profess to be pupils; are we like our Teacher? We call ourselves servants; but are we as our Master? He was very simple in his tastes and habits. A lover of the flowers of the field; content with one good dish as all that was needful for a meal; his clothes like those worn by the peasant-class, except his inner tunic, his mother's gift, which the soldiers would not rend. He was meek and lowly in heart. Let us shun ambition, pride, and that offensive haughtiness which eschews the poor man's lot, and home, and company. Do not be anxious to be great; and if greatness comes to you, be good and humble, counting influence and success as precious talents of which you must give an account. He was much given to prayer. Set apart a place in your room or house for prayer. Set apart a time, do not wait for moods. Often the fairest days are born out of the brooding mists of the morning. Persevere, till your wings bear you above the east wind skywards.

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE majestic character of Paul is shown by the way in which our interest in him grows as we follow him through scene after scene of trying ordeal. And our appreciation of the ability of St. Luke as a biographer deepens, for a tedious writer would have wearied us after three or four rehearsals of the same case before different tribunals. As a matter of fact, this book is great literature as well as vital religious history. Men and women who do not read and value the Biblical masterpieces cannot claim a well-rounded culture, for they have omitted an integral part of the world's classics. Out of a great mass of argument and incident Luke gives us just enough to make a clear picture of Paul's skilful escape from a legal trap.

The Law's Delay

TWO years and more of anxious waiting for decision! Week upon week, month upon month of uncertainty, "neither free nor convicted." Trial after trial, and a long wait before the last appeal was to be decided. It was probably during this period especially that Paul "learned in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content," as he afterward wrote his Philippian friends. Yet what a monstrous injustice it was, and what a travesty upon Rome's boasted judicial system! Justice is not justice without promptness.

All Christians should be interested in the movement to expedite justice in our own land. Great minds are at work upon its problems, and public opinion should enforce their conclusions. Court calendars are crowded. Litigants wait months for a hearing. By carrying the case from one judge to another and taking advantage of all sorts of postponements justice is delayed for years and poor claimants exhausted by disappointment and expense.

In private affairs delay is often injustice. We ought not to put off decisions when like that of Felix they involve the well-being of others. Promises and postponement have embittered countless lives.

The Compensations of God

YET God makes even the wrath of men to praise him. Evils come, and "woe to him by whom the offense cometh"; yet God can bring forth therefrom some good thing. The present great war is wrong and contrary to God's wish for his children. It is hideous to Christ. Yet the Almighty is able to bring from its suffering and sacrifice some great new gifts of his love for the progress and blessing of the race.

So here the unjust delay gave the weary traveler rest. Apart from turmoil and crowded days, his great themes had a fallow period when the mind assimilated new richness to their meanings. Unconsciously one's convictions formulate themselves and ideas grow in such times. All teachers, orators and thought-handlers need these quiet seasons of the soul. John Bunyan fretted at first because his best years slipped by without a chance to preach, but now all the world feeds upon the Pilgrim's Progress, the matchless sermon-allegory that grew out of those silent years in Bedford Jail. It is a common experience for men of action to find that a serious illness or an enforced vacation has given a new current to their lives. They had been so intent on making headway that they had not fully considered the direction in which they were going. Great poems, deep philosophies have ripened in jails.

A Juster Judge

IT is with relief that we turn from Felix to Festus and remember that the New Testament gives, on the whole, a very favorable character to the Roman officials. Cornelius, Gallio, Sergius Paulus, Lysias, Festus and Julius (the commander of the Augustan Regiment on shipboard) go far to counterbalance the shifty Pilate and the corrupt Felix. Festus was about the best of the Roman procurators, but his administration was all too short. Immediately upon his arrival at Jerusalem he was importuned by the priests to give over the notable prisoner to their custody. He responded with some sarcasm that it was not the custom of Romans to hand over a man without a hearing. His intended fairness is clear throughout, tempered only by a very natural disinclination to antagonize the leaders of his new bailiwick.

He also refused to take the prisoner away from the seat of government, thus unconsciously frustrating the plot to murder him on the way. He promptly and vigorously attacks the problem with which his predecessor had dallied so long for fear of giving offense or in hope of a bribe. His despatch is shown by the fact that Paul was heard "the next day" after Festus reached the capital. After the affair, he was frank enough to confess to Agrippa that he could not fathom the matter, the bitterness shown against an attractive and candid man puzzled him. His sense of justice caused him to seek the aid of one more expert in Jewish affairs to enable him to give an impartial finding to the imperial commission at Rome.

"Charges Which They Could Not Prove"

THIS is the characterization made by Luke of the statements of the Jerusalem authorities, Paul succinctly refuting the three indictments once more. It is one thing for a man to be charged and quite another to be found guilty. The early Christians were mobbed and martyred because of unfounded charges of infanticide, of treason and of being "haters of the human race!" It is a serious injustice to take slanderous accusations for granted. It is of course still worse to pass them on when we cannot prove them. What hideous "charges which they could not prove" the political grafters made against Thomas Mott Osborne when he tried to befriend the prisoners of Sing Sing! What vile slanders are circulated from time to time about Presidents, governors and prominent citizens! What troublesome gossip distresses even the smallest com-mity, with professing Christians in- ed as talebearers! "Let your yea ea and your nay, nay," said Jesus, he implied that a court room could add to a true disciple's veracity— impeach it. The priests before us belong to an innumerable com- who have forgotten that "thou not bear false witness against thy ibor" is one of the fundamentals e Bible. Slander is grouped to- er with blasphemy, murder and in the law of Moses. "Charges h they could not prove" classify group of men with thieves and lerers. Shall he be guiltless who s a good name and assassinates an rable reputation?

ccused and Accusers Face to Face

THIS is the object of all sorts of courts and always tends to estab- he truth. Even a Roman ignorant e technicalities of the affair could which side was nearest right. But principle goes further. When ge and countercharge are bandied dissatisfied employees and angry oyers, the principle of arbitration ld be used to bring out the actual . By separate meetings and biased ments the misunderstanding grows. to sit around a great table in the ence of disinterested hearers pro- es understanding and forbearance cool judgment. One would think this would appeal to all Christian ons as a rational substitute for which has been defined as "the ement of logical disputes by killing ."

he would surely expect that in a stian church conference and "ar- tion" would be relied upon to heal rences. Paul was shocked when nthian Christians went to law nst one another. He was grieved n individuals quarreled and parted nger. He was indignant when less accusations were made, even himself, behind his back. Let sed and accusers come face to face, n atmosphere of prayer and grace forbearance.

Favoritism

THE probity of Festus was severely taxed by his reluctance to offend e men of influence. Hoping to ate them, he appealed to the pris- to consent to be remanded to salem for retrial by the Sanhedrin, nising to be present himself. But avoided that trap. It was a civil (at Cæsar's judgment seat), and was either guilty or not guilty. If y he should be punished, but if not y he should be set free. It was a ging rebuke, and the honest Festus t have blushed, for Paul closed with expression: "No man can hand me to them as a favor. I appeal to ar." As a Roman citizen he ap- ed to the emperor to save him from ritism; such is the distinct impli- on of the Greek words.

An Appeal to a Higher Court

I a dignified way Paul asserted his onstitutional right as a Roman en and appealed to the Supreme rt at Rome. Festus conferred with legal advisers and found this pro- ire to be lawful. "Dost thou ap- to Cæsar?" Paul courteously ed assent to the governor. "Unto ar shalt thou go."

was a big step toward justice when right of appeal first came into the ts of this world. A loftier, more artial tribunal usually avoids the udice and heat of the lower juris- ion and frequently reverses its de- n. But even when, as here, the reme Court fails to vindicate the sed, we can appeal to a more ex- l Judge. "God is my witness," aimed Paul to the Roman Chris- s. "The Lord, the righteous ge," he writes to Timothy from o's prisonhouse. At the judgment of God many of this world's ments shall be reversed. The first l be last and the last first. Publi- and harlots shall be received, and risees and priests rejected. Some hose whom the world has crowned honored shall be stigmatized as criminals they are and shall be sed. Some of those condemned punished now shall sit at his right hand in that day. If we have a good conscience and the assurance of our Father's blessing we need not reck the judgments of this world.

This providence we see in the vicissitudes of Paul's trying days. He was being steadily impelled toward Rome for the crowning work of his life. Enemy and friend, circumstances and changing events moved toward the final purpose of God. Paul partly realized it and was reconciled thereby. "I must see Rome," he wrote. "As thou hast borne witness of me in Jerusalem, so thou must bear witness of me in Rome," came the reassuring voice of the Spirit.

A Mysterious Case

FESTUS was pleased to be able to consult with King Agrippa about Paul. To him, a newcomer from Rome, it was certainly a mysterious case. He was perplexed by its novelty to him and by its religious basis.

The mystery of religious persecution is here. How can we account for the bitterness and malignity with which men will harry those of alien faith? History teems with examples the hatred of the priests for Jesus and Paul is but one of many. There is the awful vindictiveness of Roman paganism against early Christians, with the arena and the lions. There is the cruel suppression of the Waldenses in medieval Italy. There is the stake and the whipping-post in England and New England for dissenters.

There is the mystery of personality here. What a marvelous force one man can be! Paul stands forth in Acts there, majestic, magnetic, compelling, and the Jews rage, Felix trembles, Festus wonders. He left a trail of churches and changed the lives of countless multitudes. Something supernatural, eternal, about such a spirit. It is inconceivable that a brute headsman with an ax could put an end to its existence. Personality is immortal. But who can explain it? Who can understand the bluff Luther moving millions to cut loose in a generation from the accumulated rubbish of centuries? But personality is not restricted to the great heroes. The humblest mother with a heart of love, ministering to her children, reveals unearthly powers. This mystery should deepen our respect for every human soul. Jesus could not despise even the least of God's children.

The mystery of the resurrection is here. Poor Festus: "They had certain questions of their own religion, of one Jesus who was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive." That was all incomprehensible to him. How could Jesus be alive if he had died? Superstition, that's all it was! Even if true, what was its bearing upon them or him? Now these are the deepest problems of religion still, and those who dismiss them lightly are more censurable today than Festus was then. It matters immensely that death does not end all, that immortality waits beyond. It matters for character, for the choice of the life we shall lead here. It matters for our treatment of others, of the child, of the man going astray, of the convicted criminal. It is still a great mystery that the death of Jesus is the world's turning-point, and has been the greatest single source of moral power. How does the Atonement operate in life? Who shall fully explain it? Yet millions have crucified the old man with Christ and risen with him to newness of life. Christ did die, and for us. Christ is alive, "alive for evermore," and the living Christ is the world's present hope and need and glory.

He is no fable old nor mythic lore,
  No dream of bards and seers,
No dead fact stranded on the shore
  Of the oblivious years.

But warm, sweet, tender even yet,
  A present help is he;
And faith has still its Olivet
  And love its Galilee.

The healing of the seamless dress
  Is by our beds of pain;
We touch him in life's throng and press,
  And we are whole again.

"This Year I had Six Dresses Instead of Two"

"PRETTIER dresses—more stylish, better made, and for the first time in my life dresses that my friends say have my own individuality in every line. And they cost me less than the two I had last season. How did I manage? I made them all myself. Besides, I've made three skirts and half a dozen blouses, and practically everything that the children are wearing. And a year ago I couldn't make a buttonhole."

Today hundreds of women are telling practically this same story of how they have found the easy, delightful way to clothes economy through the simple and practical Home-Study Courses in Dressmaking and Millinery offered by the

WOMAN'S INSTITUTE OF DOMESTIC ARTS & SCIENCES INC.

By our new easy method you can learn right at home in spare time to make all your own and your children's clothes and save two-thirds of what they now cost you. Our new method is entirely different from anything you ever have seen or heard of. So simple you can start making garments at once. Hundreds of pictures show and explain every step.

In Dressmaking, you learn how to design, plan and make garments of every kind; renovate and remodel; copy dresses you see on the street, in the shops or in the fashion magazines; do all kinds of fancy work; dress in taste and style. In Millinery, how to design and trim hats, construct and alter shapes, make all kinds of ribbon flowers and bows. These are but suggestions.

Be a Dressmaker or Milliner

With the thorough training these Courses give you, you can go into business, secure a good paying position or open a shop of your own. The demand for dressmakers and milliners is greater than the supply.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter
Author of "POLLYANNA"

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, to any present subscriber as a reward for sending us one new eight-months' subscription accompanied by $1.00. Or, we will renew your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year and send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, for $2.00

Missions Among the Women of India

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 9 : 2-4

THROUGH centuries of oppression, of slavery, of cruelties unmentionable and of customs almost unthinkable, the women of India walked in darkness. For them India was the "land of the shadow of death." It was even better to be a martyr on the burning pyre of a dead husband than to face the miseries of Hindoo widowhood. The men of India had the rights of their caste, such as it was, but no woman of any caste had any rights, except perhaps the negative right which forbade her marrying outside her caste. Women of India were chattels, slaves, condemned to ignorance, to violation, to degradation sometimes worse than death. Even motherhood was not sacred; for while the dominant Brahmanism of India taught a measure of self-control, it knew nothing of love, of courtesy, of consideration. It was cold and cruel.

Small wonder, then, that into the zenanas of India the message of the Christ came as the great light which was to lighten their darkness; for it bore a message of love, of personal salvation, of happiness. The mission teachers opened to the women of India the pages of the Book from which has come the spirit of Christian civilization, and the mission doctors ministered to them and to their children. Hope came instead of hopelessness. They flocked to the schools, they endured multiplied persecutions, they studied, they learned, and they went back to their villages to bear the liberating message of the Gospel of Christ, which can make free the heart even of a slave. And now the villages of India are coming to Christ en masse. The light of God's great sacrifice for men is illumining the darkest corners of this land of shadow.

Public Spirit and How to Cultivate It

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic.
Ps. 122 : 1-9
(Citizenship Sunday)

WE cultivate a growing crop by destroying living things that would destroy it or take nourishment from it or retard its growth. We cultivate Public Spirit in much the same way. First we must destroy that virulent weed called selfishness. The gain to self must be the last element in Public Spirit, for Public Spirit is that spirit which seeks only the highest good of all. In every election year a great many men suddenly become most intensely public-spirited. But when their public spirit is analyzed it often proves to be only another spelling of public office. Such public spirit is only a magnified personal selfishness. It might be a good rule to deny public office to any one who sought it except in answer to a public demand, but at any rate a high degree of public spirit is needed in the choice of public officers. No man should receive our vote merely because he is on our ticket. True public spirit ignores party lines.

But the best public spirit is that which seeks to put the impress of the Christ upon our common life. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee." Peace comes only when conflict ceases, and conflict ceases only when love has banished injustice, when every man seeks only another's good, not his goods, when the spirit of consecrated self-sacrifice becomes the center of our national life.

Merry Moments

THE WIRELESS PHONE. A little North Carolina girl went with her mother to make a call. On their way home they got lost in the woods. After they had wandered about for some time trying to find the way out, the little girl, becoming weary of it, looked at her mother and exclaimed, "Mamma, why don't you phone?"

NOT HAIR-RAISING ADVENTURES. Grandpa, who was entirely bald, was telling little William some Indian stories in which he had figured.

"It is a miracle," he concluded, "that I was in so many fights and not once injured."

"Well, then," asked William, "who scalped you?"

TESTING THE SENSES. The old Scotch professor was trying to impress upon his students the value of observation.

"No," he complained, "ye dinna use your faculties of observation. Ye dinna use 'em. For instance—"

Picking up a beaker of chemicals of horrible odor, he stuck his finger into it, and then into his mouth.

"Taste of it, gentlemen," he commanded, as he passed the beaker from student to student.

After each had licked a finger and had felt rebellion through his whole soul, the old professor laughed in triumph.

"I told ye so!" he shouted. "Ye dinna use your faculties. For if ye had observed ye would ha' seen that the finger which I stuck into the pot was na the finger which I stuck into my mouth!"—Chicago Herald.

ente t by German and Bulgarian troops, the city s garrisoned by the Fourth Greek Army Cor According to an official statement issu by Berlin, the entire corps, consisting of 20,0 men, asked the German commander for food nd shelter and protection against the Ent e forces. The statement said that, to prev t any breach of neutrality, the Greek sold s would be transported to Germany, to be l t there as guests of the nation. The Ger n account of the affair differs radically fron hat given out at the Allied capitals and fron tories sent out from Athens. The number soldiers transported to Germany, acco to these versions, was less than a thousan one account placing the total at 70 offi- cers d 800 men.

T incident caused a profound sensation in Gre , and the action of the Germans was bitt y denounced by the pro-Ally party. Gre has now, it is reported, addressed a den d to Germany for the return of these troc to her immediately, and has formally disa wed the action of their commander.

C the northern Greek border there has bee me hard fighting in the past week by the Alli left wing on the western end of their line nd an extremely interesting military pos n has developed. As has been pointed out fore, the center and right wing of the Alli on this front are held "in check" by the Bul ian forces on the Seres-Kavala line, which out k them. To offset this disadvantage, Ger ar ail has initiated a series of movements by troops composing the Allies' left wing, whi has as object the driving of the Bulgarian rig ving to the northeast, which would eventual produce the same state of affairs as exists on the lies' right wing, only in this case it would be Bulgarians who would be outflanked.

Vile this has not been achieved during the pas eek, decided progress has been made by the lies. These latter have succeeded in captur Florina, about ten miles directly south of nastir, and by other successes to the east anc est of Florina in driving back the entire Bu rian right wing across the Serbian border, a l distance of perhaps ten miles.

next logical step in this movement would be e capture of Monastir, but this is an op tion which will not be any too easy, since it nown that the Bulgarians have for sev- era onths been engaged in installing defenses of kinds in front of that town, which is now sai o be well fortified and prepared for just suc n emergency as confronts it. In fact, sin the capture of Florina on Monday, Se mber 17, the Bulgarians' resistance to the ad ice of the Allies has considerably stiffened, wi the result that up to the present the All have not been able to make much fur er progress forward. These operations are eing undertaken for the Allies by the Fr h and Serbian contingents.

L TLE news of importance has come to us n regard to the Caucasian campaign in the pa week. The British report winning a skirmish with the Turks in the Mount Sinai peninsula, but on the other hand the Turks report defeating the British in Mesopotamia, east of Kut-el-Amara, with heavy losses.

Great Britain has apologized to the United States for violating its territorial waters in the Philippines in the search of a steamer, the Cebu, within the three-mile limit, claiming that, owing to a heavy fog which prevailed at the time of the search, the nearness of the searched steamer to the land was not perceived. Washington regards the incident as closed.

On the north Rumanian front the week has not been a particularly good one for the invaders of Transylvania. Their left wing and center have been held practically stationary by the Austrians, who have been considerably reinforced; and their right wing, which had nearly reached Hatzeg, north of Petroseny, has been driven south and out of Transylvania and Petroseny, and the Szurduk Pass, south of that place, has been retaken by the Austrians. The capture of this pass gives the Austrians an easy method of entering Rumania, as it is only twenty miles north of Tirjin-Juilui at the head of the Rumanian railroad leading south to Kraiova.

On the south front, until the middle of the week, the Rumanians and Russians steadily retreated before von Mackensen's forces, nor did this retreat stop until a previously fortified and prepared line running from Rachova on the Danube to Tulsa on the Black Sea was reached. This line runs a little to the south of the wall built by Trajan, in the days of the Roman empire, from the Danube to the Black Sea. If this line is forced the Rumanians are fairly sure of losing their most important port on this sea, Constanza, as well as the only railroad connecting the Black Sea coast with the interior of the country.

For the past two days a furious battle has been going on all along this line, which has not been decided as this record closes.

On the Austro-Italian front, hard fighting near Vallone and on the Carso plateau resulted in some Italian gains, but did not result in any decided piercing of the Austrian line of defenses.

The eastern front in the main continued in a waiting attitude during the week just passed, September 16–22.

Except that during the past week the Russians showed their greatest activity in the south of Bukowina, where they have been joined by Rumanian forces of unknown extent, the same general course was followed last week. In southern Bukowina they gained some ground after hard struggles toward the passes in the Carpathians leading from Bukowina into Hungary, and in the mountains south of Stanislau as well.

But to the north on the Stochod in Volhynia and on the Sereth in Galicia, as well as to the east of Halicz, the key of Lemberg, their progress was nil. In fact, on the Stochod they lost ground and at one place were driven to the east side of that river by the Teutonic forces.

Twelve Zeppelins raided London and the eastern counties on Saturday night, September 23. Twenty-eight persons were killed and ninety injured in London, and considerable damage was done to houses and small stores. Two of the Zeppelins were brought down. One fell in flames, the crew perishing; the other was forced to the ground and its crew of twenty-one captured.

Fire Prevention Day. Monday, October 9, is to be Fire Prevention Day in nearly all of the states. It is planned by exhibitions and public ceremonies to develop a greater public interest in the campaign for greater safety from fire. The American annual average fire loss exceeds $250,000,000 and 3,000 lives.

School Opens in New York. The infantile paralysis epidemic in New York City was so far under control that the school and health authorities permitted the schools to open on September 25. Only 20 new cases were reported on September 22. The totals to September 23 are: cases, 8,861; deaths, 2,226.

Unions Threaten New York. The traction strike in New York City threatens wide developments. Each day the companies are operating more cars for longer hours and there is less violence. The mayor and Public Service Commission urge arbitration in vain. The companies refuse to deal again with the unions, and the unions, declaring that the fight is for the principle of unionism, have enlisted many leaders of other organized trades in an effort to force a favorable settlement. The threat of a general strike has been held over the city for more than a week. It was first set for Friday, September 22, and was then set for Wednesday, September 27. At this writing the leaders claim that 179,000 of the 800,000 unionists in New York are ready to strike, and that others will vote before Wednesday. The more responsible unions are showing hesitation in breaking contracts for no better reason than sympathy, and there is some doubt as to the power of the leaders to bring about a general strike. The State Board of Mediation will begin a thorough investigation of the trouble on Tuesday, September 26.

WHAT THE CRITICS ARE SAYING about the biggest selling novel ever published Harold Bell Wright's
WHEN A MAN'S A MAN
Illustrations and Decorations by the Author
Cloth $1.35 Leather $1.85
Selling Average 5,100 Copies Daily

WHEN A MAN'S A MAN is a story, true, of the real heart of the life of the unfenced land of ranch and range of Northern Arizona.

The New York Times: There is much of the vigorous outdoor life of the Southwest in the story, and Mr. Wright writes of it with knowledge and with graphic truth.

Boston Globe: Redolent of the open and the clean, wholesome life of the West. The author has never written a more clean or uplifting story.

Philadelphia Press: A welcome successor to such stories as "The Calling of Dan Matthews," "The Shepherd of the Hills" and "The Winning of Barbara Worth." Mr. Wright's West is as real as reality can be.

Chicago Examiner: When he describes a scene you see it enacted before your mental eye, when he speaks of his characters we have a perfect picture of the persons.

Washington Times: As always, an expert in character delineation, Harold Bell Wright presents a number of clear-cut portraits in his latest book, "When a Man's a Man."

Utica Observer: He has given in "When a Man's a Man" full measure, pressed down, heaped up and running over of his best thought and best work.

Pittsburgh Gazette-Times: An unusually interesting story, one that you do not want to quit until you have finished it. A story that holds you tight and fast.

San Francisco Chronicle: The author has a fund of sane and wholesome philosophy. The plot is good and the persons in the narrative are flesh and blood.

Los Angeles Express: It is a photographic picture of life on the plains, without the sensational guesswork that marks so many such tales, written by those who lack actual experience.

Portland Oregonian: One of those pure-minded, healthy stories where reading is a joy. Pleasant to remember after the last page is read. The story really reaches high-water mark.

Tacoma Tribune: The thrilling incidents of ranch life and rodeo are as clear to us as though we were really seeing them instead of reading of them.

Christian Nation, New York: This story will charm you with its idyllic beauty, it will thrill you with its riches of vital incident, it will delight and surprise you with the kaleidoscopic changes in the course of true love; but it will compel you to think.

Fort Smith Times-Record: Though gripped by the story itself the thoughtful reader cannot but wonder how a man may so lay bare the deepest, the most sacred passions of the human soul. We often wept as we read the story, but they were tears that soothed and inspired. We were made to feel that there is a divine principle within even the most worthless of human beings and that some time in every man's life there comes the desire to arise from the ashes of a dead past, and accept the challenge to be "A Man's Man."

Other Novels by Harold Bell Wright: The Eyes of the World—Their Yesterdays—The Winning of Barbara Worth—The Calling of Dan Matthews—The Shepherd of the Hills—That Printer of Udell's—Over Seven Million Copies of Harold Bell Wright's Books Have Been Sold—at all book stores.

What Is Meant by the Second Coming of Christ?

appropriate, which seems to us the less likely; that the Son of God should come as a helpless infant, cradled in a manger, or that he should come as the Lord of Glory, riding upon the clouds of heaven? And finally, it is inconsistent with the fact of his spiritual presence with his church today, for even now, where two or three are gathered together in his name, there is he in the midst of them (Matt. 18 : 20; 28 : 20). As a matter of fact his spiritual presence never can be absent from his church, for he is God, and his Spirit dwells within us to make his presence real. All these circumstances show beyond a peradventure, as another has pointed out, "that something more is in store for us than the spiritual influences of our absent Lord."

4. A fourth class of objectors think that the progress of the Gospel and the church is the concrete fact in which the promises of Christ's coming combine. However, this cannot be, for the simple reason that, with a single exception, the two are always distinguished in the New Testament. The church is to use the sacramental symbols "till he come" (I Cor. 11). His servants are to "occupy," to trade with the goods of the nobleman until he returns (Luke 19). We are all to wait for him, and to join in the prayer of the Apocalypse, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly" (Rev. 22). The single exception is I Cor. 12 : 12, 13, the object of which is not to teach that Christ and his church are the same, but to identify the latter with the former as the body of which he is the Head.

5. Finally, the death of the Christian believer is sometimes identified with the second coming of Christ; but this, as another says, is the most extravagant of the errors. Death is an enemy, though a conquered one; while the coming of Christ is a "blessed hope" (I Cor. 15 : 55; Titus 2 : 13). Death means dissolution and decay, while the second coming of Christ means resurrection and glory (Phil. 3 : 20, 21), At death the believer goes to be with Christ, while at the second advent Christ comes to the believer (Phil. 1 : 23; John 14 : 3; 21 : 21-23).

Dr. Gray closes this interesting article in the next issue of the Christian Herald with an analysis of certain Greek words that, the author reasons, show the second coming of Christ will be "personal in the sense of visible." Editor.

Bible Picture Contest

THE previous announcement in the Christian Herald that a "score of answers" had been submitted for several of the pictures was misunderstood by some of our readers, who interpreted our statement to mean that among contestants were some who had submitted a score of answers for one picture. Obviously this could not be, as the rules governing the contest specifically limited the number of verses which could be submitted for one picture in one set of answers to five.

After weeks of careful work we have compiled for the consideration of the Judges a list containing all the verses submitted for Picture No. 1, all the verses submitted for Picture No. 2, etc., to Picture No. 60. The least number of verses submitted for any one picture was 84. The greatest number for any one picture, which was picture No. 51, was 466. For many of the pictures from 200 to 300 different answers were submitted. The total number of different verses submitted for the sixty pictures was 9,727.

The answers submitted have been specially printed and given to the Judges for their examination. Just as soon as they make known their decision we will publish in the Christian Herald the verse or verses which the Judges select as the "best" answer or answers. Then we will begin the actual examination of the sets of answers sent to us to ascertain the winners of the prizes. This final step of the contest will be hastened as much as possible.

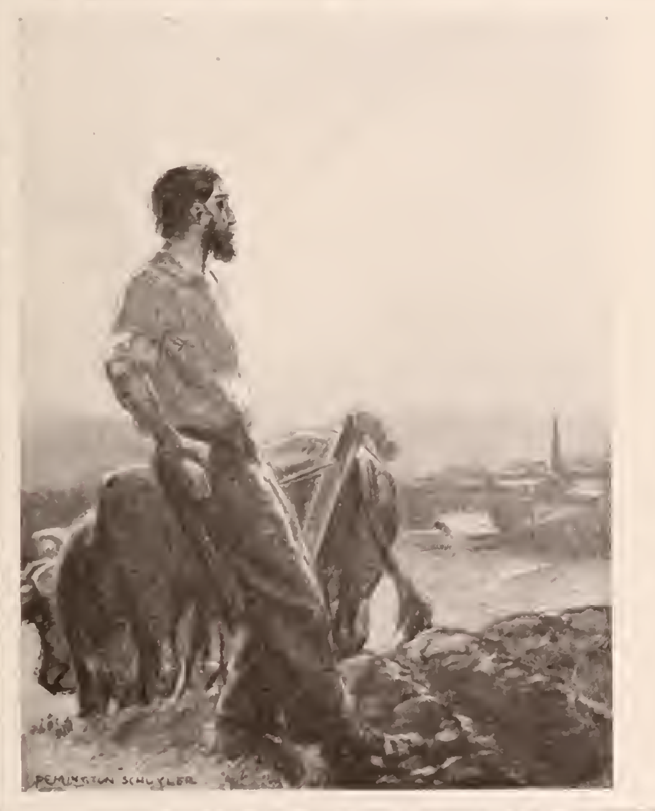
STUDENT, Colo. Please tell me through the Mail-Bag the Scriptural difference between a vision and a dream. Do visions always come during waking hrs. or may they e while asleep?

vision has been ned as a supernural presentation of ain scenery or circistances to the mind person while awake, reas a dream occurs ing sleep, when tically all the ses and faculties of mind, with the eption of those imliately allied to or ised by some parlar cause, are quiest. The term "vi" is frequently used describe the ecstatic e of the prophets n they were utteri warnings or preions. See Num. 6-8; 24 : 15-16; 1 a 3 : 1.



MY MISSION

MY brother sailed over the seas today to the East
To carry the tidings of Christ to sin-blinded souls.
I would have gone with him—but God needs me here.

Down in the village the preacher works with his books,
Finding the truth and telling it in the church,
Winning the sinners to come to the paths of Christ,
Comforting those who mourn and helping those who die,
Preaching on Sundays the riches unsearchable.
Those are tasks I should like—but God needs me here.

Here on these hills where my fields lie brown and warm,
Here where the soil needs turning and seed must grow,
Here to raise grain and fruits and find milk for the town,
Here where the aged mother lingers along with me,
Here where the wife and babies laugh and sing.
God needs me here—and so I abide with him.

MISSIONS? Sermons? I fancy God knows best.
We cannot all take those high and honored tasks.
I'll farm my farm for him, and help all I can—
My brother, the parson, and neighbors far and near.

So for a minute I rest on my plow, and think.
And God seems very near. There's a light in my soul.
"Help me to live, Lord, and work so that light will spread.
Help me to help those who are bearing it over the world."

I am glad it is meeting night. I'll go down to the church
And say something there about this sweet light of God.

S., Washington. C., writes: "As was ed in the Christian ald in your article 'The Factory and Fragrance,' there is ething missing in church. This is sing: the 'fountain d with blood.' Take away, and what is ? God is love, and h what intensity he es we are not able understand; but re is no anarchy h God, who rules whole universe, he says, 'The soul t sinneth shall die.'"

Reader, Quincy, Mich. If you will send us the facts, precisely as they occurred, we y be able to advise you.

Mrs. J. H. McP., Winnipeg. We have sent r letter to the Prayer League, with the uest that they pray that you may find light l comfort and peace. A better frame of d will bring acquiescence in God's will, and ater faith in his pardoning and protecting ver.

E. R. S., Orlando, Okla. A wise pastor will to maintain harmony in the flock. It pens, unfortunately, that some pastors pt as advisers members who do not repret the views and wishes of the church as a ole, and the result is usually dissension and oss of membership. We would advise you consult with your minister before taking decided step.

G. M., Corvallis, Ore. Is it altogether unlikely that this awful European war is one of the vials of God's wrath mentioned in Revelation? If it is, will our praying bring the war to a close, since perhaps it is one of the vials or bowls of divine wrath already poured out, and hence must go on till it is fulfilled? We sincerely wish the war was stopped, God willing, but we fear it is one of the vials of his wrath. We don't know, but who can safely say it is not? I read my Bible and wonder about these things. Much praying has been done, but it seems to avail nothing in this matter.

There are many writers on prophecy who dealing with this subject at the present e, and who endeavor to identify the worldr with certain portions of the prophecies Revelation. We are strongly reminded at there are mysteries which cannot be plained by even the wisest of human beings. e true duty of the Christian concerning ophecy should be one of prayer and preparan: certainly not one of dogmatic assertion. ithin the last twenty years, and especially ce the beginning of the present war, we have received many letters referring to books that have been written on this subject and asking an opinion. Our invariable answer has been that none may know the will of God in his working out of these mighty problems, except as such knowledge comes with the bestowal of divine wisdom. We can, however, pray for the salvation of men and the restoration of peace on earth in God's own good time.

F. H. H., Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The Scripture states distinctly that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven (I Cor. 15 : 50), and that there is a "natural body" and there is a "spiritual body" (I Cor. 15 : 44); also, eternal life is promised to those who repent and believe, and is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. We have the assurance of a life hereafter from our Saviour's own lips. There are, however, many things associated with the subject which are not disclosed and about which conjectures are futile.

X. Y. Z., Lisbon, Iowa. Theological terms have but little meaning for the mind of childhood. The child, however, can be taught that God is over all, the Creator, the loving Father, Provider and Preserver, and that all good things come from him; also that he has always been what he is today, that he has always existed, and that all things live through and by him: that he made this and other worlds, the stars and all that we see, know and hear. Eternity is a problem that can only be dealt with in the simplest terms to make any impression upon the minds of the very young.

A. C. R., Minneapolis, Minn., writes: "Over forty years ago, I started to give one-sixth of my income to the Lord's work. My idea was to give my earnings for one day in every week, and I have tried to keep this up, as best I could figure it, to the present time. It does not seem right to me to take the Lord's tenth to live on, or to pay our debts with. If there is any cutting to be made, let it be from the nine-tenths and not from the Lord's money. The treasuries for the funds with which to carry on the Lord's work always seem to be short, and I consider it to be the most important work there is for us to do."

Mrs. C. M. D., Oxford, N. H. The word "Cant.," which you find in your subject-index, is a contraction for "Canticles," another name for "the Song of Solomon."

Reader, Enola, Pa. What is the meaning of "twice dead" and "these are spots in your feasts of charity" in Jude 12?

To interpret the expression "twice dead," one must read the verse in connection with the two immediately preceding verses. Those who are given over wholly to the world, with its sinful pleasures and gross indulgences, had no conception of and spoke bitterly against the things of the spiritual world, which they could not understand. They were in this sense dead, having no spiritual life and caring only for the things of the flesh and the gratification of sensual appetite. In verse 12 he addresses professing Christians and warns them that their "love feasts," which should be holy and decorous observances, were in danger of shipwreck from sinful abuses creeping in. These "love feasts" which accompanied the Lord's Supper (see 1 Cor. 11 : 20 and following verses) were degenerating into mere occasions for the pampering of appetite, instead of being seasons of spiritual refreshing. Those who partook of them in the wrong spirit and not in the fear of God he likens to withered, fruitless trees, that were dead while they stood; as far as fruit-bearing was concerned, and which, when plucked up by the roots, became hopelessly dead. The application is to those who, once dead in sin, were raised by profession and baptism to the life of righteousness, but who now apostatize, and thus become "twice dead."

A. S., Oakland, Calif. Boundaries between countries, states and counties, and between cities and the country surrounding them, are marked in various ways. Sometimes it is by a stone post or monument; often a county is separated from an adjoining county by a public road, which is surveyed purposely on the county line. In some of the Southern states, counties which allow cattle to run at large are often separated from those which do not by a fence. The boundary between Alaska and Canada is marked by a cleared strip in the woods 875 miles long. When a highway passes from one country into another, the traveler is made aware of the fact by the customs officials; sometimes also, as in France, a tax is collected on country produce entering the cities. But in thinly settled sections of the United States the boundaries between counties, and even between states, are not always marked, and though known to the inhabitants, are often not to be recognized by a stranger. One notable instance of a marked boundary is the Great Wall of China, which extends for a distance of more than 1,500 miles along what was once the frontier of that empire.

G. O. H., Payette, Idaho. 1. It is on record as a matter of history that in times of great famine and distress, people who were regarded as civilized have been driven to eat human flesh. The passages in Deut. 28 : 53, 57; Ezek. 5 : 10; Jer. 19 : 9 and Lam. 4 : 10 refer to such experiences during times of siege. The Jews, however, were never addicted to cannibalism, and save in the extreme cases mentioned—the sieges of Samaria and Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the destruction of the latter city by the Romans—there is nothing in their history to show that it was ever charged to them. 2. Jacob's experience at the brook Jabbok is referred to in Hosea 12 : 5 and 12 : 4 and the opinion most supported by commentators is that the wrestling spirit was the "Angel of the Covenant." There are many who interpret the episode as an actual physical one, and others as a visionary scene. 3. The other Old Testament passages you mention are among the deep and inexplicable scenes referred to in the Bible. How much of the language which relates to God's revelation of himself to Moses is designed to be interpreted figuratively and how much literally is a question which even the most consecrated Bible scholarship cannot decide. Certainly, some of it is to be accepted symbolically, and that it was so taken by the early Christian church we may gather from I Tim. 6 : 16, 17 and John 1 . 18.

X. Y. W., Oil City, Pa. There is some question as to the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews. What is known on the subject?

Hebrews was originally admitted to the canon of New Testament Scriptures with reservations. These doubts, however, have long since disappeared, and it is now secure in its established place as one of the canonical books. In the early church, the question of its authorship was much discussed. The Alexandrian fathers noted what they considered a discrepancy of style between it and the other Pauline Epistles, but (as Olshausen, an eminent authority, has pointed out) such a doubt existed nowhere else, either in Syria, Palestine, Asia or Greece. Clement and Origen, while contending that the translation might be the work of Luke, both held that it was done from a Pauline original. In recent years many eminent Bible scholars, after full inquiry, have come to the conclusion that the epistle is the work of Paul and no other. Among these are Rev. C. Forster, Professor Stuart, Dr. C. Wordsworth and Dr. S. Davidson. At the same time, it should be stated that not a few have inclined to the belief that Barnabas, Silas, Clement or Apollos may have been the author. A great deal has been written concerning the controversy, but the weight of internal evidence is regarded as favorable to Paul's authorship, and it is pointed out that many of the figures and allusions are peculiarly Pauline, while other characteristics of his style are found in the book.

J. L. H., Boston, Mass., writes: "The Christian Herald comment on the infantile paralysis scare is the most sensible editorial I have seen in any paper published from Maine to California. The daily press and many of the weeklies, when any disease of children, adults or animals breaks out, announce in startling headlines its worst features, which serve to scare readers, and especially young mothers. When the first scare about infantile paralysis appeared in the papers this season, I wrote an eminent physician asking five questions, and his answers agreed with my previously formed opinion, from long experience with my own and observation of other people's children. Summed up, he wrote: 'It is no more contagious than cholera infantum. Quarantining is unnecessary and useless. It is no new disease, but has been known for more than a century. Many of the cases reported are only severe attacks of the ordinary diseases of childhood.' It is safe to go slow on advertising terrible diseases. The first two lines of your editorial state a tremendous truth."

P. N. A., Boulder, Colo. Please reconcile Eph. 4 : 26 with James 1 : 19-20.

To do so one must consider that wrath is not only allowable but in certain cases commanded. Yet in no case should sin be joined with it. This throws the emphasis on the second member of the sentence, so that the first becomes more of an assumption than a command. There is no necessity for supposing that all wrath is sinful. Sinless wrath is like the wrath of God, and needs no excuse.

Questions and Answers

E. T. K., Goshen, N.Y. 1. I have been reading about the baptism of Christ, and notice for the first time that Jesus and John might have been alone. I had always supposed that the manifestation of the Spirit in the form of a dove was witnessed by a multitude; but the account says, "He saw," etc. The account in Luke is the only one from which we might infer that a multitude was present, but even there the people may have departed. What is your opinion? 2. In I Cor. 15 : 24-25, does it mean that until the event recorded there comes to pass, the Son is superior to God the Father?

1. The accounts of Christ's baptism are not at all contradictory. The heaven was opened, say all the accounts; Matthew and Mark say it was opened to Jesus, and John that it was opened to the Baptist, while Luke simply states the fact. It is unlikely that any multitude witnessed this miraculous appearance of the Holy Spirit to publicly inaugurate our Lord as the Messiah. If it had been so some mention would have been made of the impression created in the minds of the spectators. 2. Those who find the divinity of Christ in every account of his work find no difficulty in this passage. This delivering up of the kingdom means that he is to give an account of his stewardship to him who entrusted him with it. The Son is never superior to the Father, but is equal with him in power and glory. If in his wisdom God the Father entrusted certain specific activities to the Son —such as, for instance, the subjugation of all his enemies—that does not necessarily imply a superseding by the Son.

J. G., Singer, La. Please give me an explanation of St. Matthew 12 : 20.

In this allegorical statement the bruised reed and smoking flax represent the status of some sinners. The reed is a hollow cylinder, so formed that its strength and usefulness are well-nigh lost, if it be bruised; in other words, it is feeble. The figure points to the state of the sinner as weak and useless, while "bruised" suggests contrition. The second figure is the "smoking flax." Threads of flax were used as wicks, and smoking resulted from the faulty wick rather than from exhaustion of oil. Quenching it would be throwing it away altogether on account of its imperfections. That is not the Lord's way. He will not crush the bruised heart nor extinguish the slightest spark of repentant feeling in the heart of the sinner.

H. N. T., Argyle, N. Y. Do you think that Judas was a wicked man when Jesus chose his apostles? You know that he said at the Supper, the devil entered into him and Jesus said, "What thou doest, do quickly." Do you think he was chosen to betray him to fulfil prophecy?

Jesus was no doubt aware of the possibilities of evil in Judas, which were probably not developed when he was chosen as an apostle. But Christ knew of the intended treachery before it was committed. Doubtless Judas himself at the time of his call had no idea that he would commit such a crime. Even at the last, he may have expected that Christ would deliver himself by his miraculous power, and was horror-stricken when he learned the result of what he had done.

J. L. S., Cloverdale, Calif. Please explain Ex. 7 : 9-12.

The difficulty you find in the narrative is not new, but simple, if rightly interpreted. The sorcerers of Egypt were adept snake-charmers, and one of their principal feats was turning snakes into sticks by making them rigid and apparently dead. As the magicians whom Pharaoh summoned converted their sticks into snakes, the presumption is that, as they anticipated the work to be required of them, their sticks were disguised as snakes, which, when released from narcotic influence, they produced as living reptiles. Imagine their discomfiture when Aaron's rod or snake swallowed up their rods, for which they were wholly unprepared.

Several friends in Iowa have written us regarding the struggle now going on in that state between the "wets" and the "drys," and explaining that the activity of the churches in the temperance interest is misunderstood. It is not a political struggle in which they have engaged, but a great campaign for morality, sobriety and good government. The forces of righteousness, feeling that a crisis in temperance work throughout the state is at hand, have risen to the emergency. Their attitude is not one of partisanship in any sense, and the best proof of this fact is that good men of all parties are allied in the movement for the liberation of the state from the liquor interests. We take this opportunity of making the matter clear in a situation which has been widely misunderstood.

THE RECRUITS

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

GOING to the slaughter, and the sun is shining fair;
Going to the slaughter, without a fear or care;
Going to the slaughter, without a dream of death;
Going to the slaughter, without a quickened breath;
Going to the slaughter, a file of them three deep,
Going to the slaughter, all unknowing—
These are—sheep!

MARCHING through the city, smiling as they go;
Smiling? Yes, to cover hearts that falter slow;
Going to the slaughter—ah, they know their fate!
Going to the slaughter touched with fear and hate.
Yet too brave to question, "Where, and why, and when?"
Going to the slaughter, and they know it—
These are—men!

E. E. H., Cardenas, Cuba. In the address on "Preparedness and World-Peace," printed in the Christian Herald, Rev. R. C. Helfenstein indicates the first steps to be taken. International interests are to be placed above national interests, for they are the whole which includes the part. Spending one billion dollars in helping the people of other nations would be true internationalism, and at the same time the highest type of nationalism. Money spent in that way would build a higher and stronger wall of defense around our nation than all our navy and army preparations. It would promote everlasting good-will and peace between us and other nations. I would not say a word to lessen the offerings that are being made to relieve the present suffering millions in Europe; but I would emphasize the importance of a more permanent work, a work that can be prepared for now and carried into effect in the era of peace. Let Europe behold America prepared to step in and help provide Christian homes for Europe's homeless children as soon as the wholesale ruin of Europe's homes ceases, and the spark would kindle a flame of internationalism. There are surely thousands of young men in the United States who would enlist for life in this work, and millions who would help to carry it on.

The writer of this letter, Elmer E. Hubbard, is well known in the field of Christian effort and benevolence. His suggestions are in line with the views advocated in the Christian Herald. America has been the world's almoner for a quarter of a century, and it could adopt no nobler policy than to prepare to lead in the work of rehabilitating the ruined homes of Europe after the war. As an object-lesson to the world, it would be infinitely more powerful than the proposed gigantic expansion of armaments, which is preparedness, not for peace, but for future war.

Florida Reader. 1. "Everlasting" is a term occasionally applied to things of great antiquity, as "the everlasting hills." It is synonymous at times with "age-lasting," "time immemorial," "permanent" or "enduring." (See Gen. 49 : 26; Hab. 3 : 6, and other passages.) In the higher or spiritual application, it means eternal, literally, endless. 2. "Hell," in the sense in which it is used in Mark 9 : 45, is from "Gehenna," the public trench in the valley of Hinnom where the refuse of the city was cast, and whence the smoke from burning offal and maggots ascended day and night. The word "hell" in Acts 2 : 31 is from "hades," the unseen world, the place of the dead.

Mrs. A. G. E., Amboy, Wash. Will you kindly explain the following quotations: 1 Tim. 1 : 20; Matt. 18 : 18; Luke 16 : 9.

1. "Delivering unto Satan" indicates, as in 1 Cor. 5 : 5, the thought that Satan when permitted exercises power to inflict disease and pain in the bodies of men, analogous to that of which we read in the Book of Job. That power is recognized by Christ (Luke 13 : 16) and by St. Paul in reference to himself (II Cor. 12 : 7). It might be connected, as in the case at Corinth (1 Cor. 5 : 2), with excommunication, but was not identical with it. In both cases it was a remedial measure. The spirit was to be saved by the destruction of the flesh. Men were to be chastened and disciplined. 2. Controversial and hence not answerable in this column. 3. In this passage our Lord was showing how worldly people, in their generation and for their own selfish purposes, were prudent and sagacious in the worldly sense, and showed energy and determination in carrying out their mercenary plans, none of which, however, were for God and eternity. They were types of the money-makers. Even from them the children of light might learn to use money, not, as the unrighteous steward did, for selfish ends, but for doing good with it, and by so doing they would make themselves friends in heaven, for while such acts would not open the door of heaven they would cause those who had been benefited to give a cordial welcome to their benefactors on arriving there.

"A Seeker after the Truth," Great Neck, N. Y., writes: "We see so many articles nowadays in which there is the unconscious inquiry as to how we are to account for the world war in the present period of the Christian era. Whether expressed or not, we generally see a hint that there is in the writer's mind this ever-present questioning. All true Christians know that Christ is as real a personality today to the honest believer as he was to the apostle Paul. But how many persons are there at this moment who know Christ as Paul did? And faith was the secret of it all. If we live in the Spirit, we cannot fail to walk in the Spirit, and that is what Paul himself did. It takes a faith such as Paul had to be a Christian, and have we that faith? No one can honestly deny that there are millions of Christians seeking to live as Christ would have them live. But what is lacking? This is the need: a faith by which Jesus Christ is revealed as he really and truly is. Let our prayer be from the heart. Let it be honest and sincere. And in the quiet silence, as surely as "Jehovah IS," there will come the unmistakable answer to our petition, the still small voice, and then by faith (our new or rather renewed faith) we shall, by the grace of God, have divinely revealed to us a new portrait of the Christ on earth, the true meaning of what his living on earth meant, and with this new faith we shall be able be more Christlike than ever before."

Mrs. C. J. O., Meridian, Idaho. 1. In studying Teacher Training for Service, I notice that of the fifteen judges who judged Israel, Eli is named as the fourteenth judge. Hurlbut places Eli as the thirteenth judge, Samson fourteen, and Samuel fifteen. Now what I wish to know is, did Eli judge Israel in those forty years mentioned in the first and thirteenth chapters of Judges and Samson in those twenty years that the ark was with those of Kirjath-jearim? If not, will you please explain about the judging of Eli and Samson? We are in a discussion over it in our Aid Society. 2. Another question that arose was as to the relationship of Ruth to Christ.

1. Eli was the Jewish high priest, and after the death of Samson he acted as regent or civil judge of Israel, being the immediate predecessor of Samuel, the last of the judges. Eli held the office forty years, dying at the time the ark was taken. (See 1 Sam. 4 : 18.) On the death of Eli, Samuel assumed the office. (I Sam. 7 : 15.) The line of judges in their order was as follows: Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah, Barak, Gideon, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Samson, Eli, Samuel. 2. Ruth, the wife of Boaz, was the mother of Obed, who was the father of Jesse, who was the father of David. Christ was of the line of David, as Jewish genealogies clearly show.

C. O. B., Troutdale, Ore. In what year and month was Paul born? When and where did Paul see Jesus?

It is impossible to arrive at absolute certainty regarding the date of Paul's birth. Some chronologists, however, have reached it approximately, by reckoning backward from certain incidents in the apostle's career, the date of which is identified by some historical fact. Working on this method, the year of Paul's birth is indicated in Scribner's Dictionary of the Bible as A.D. 6. He is believed to have been about thirty years old at the time of his conversion, when he "saw Jesus," as fully narrated in Acts 9. In Acts 26 : 19-21, Paul, in his defense before Agrippa, describes as "the heavenly vision." It is nowhere recorded that Paul saw the Saviour on any other occasion.

F. E. F., Brockton, Mont., sends this interesting letter, which will be helpful to many who are undergoing severe trial: "In the Mail-Bag I read the letter of Mrs. I. B. L., Missouri, who is shut in under affliction and wonders why she may not be strong and active and doing work for Christ. It reminds me of the fact that our Christian hope is of our next [illegible]-world, heaven. Here we are being perfected." The seed wheat is sown, and in the dark ground-period is born a new young plant. It grows and flourishes in its green period in warm sun and showers. Then it heads and bears its hundredfold grains proudly and says, 'This is the life.' Alas! it does not know that this is not 'life' but only a period. The knife is coming to cut, the thresher to beat away the chaff, and then on it goes to the miller's bin. Here then is 'the life'? Not so. There is between this and the life-sustaining flour another period, called the 'tempering' process. Then the mill grinds, scours, and then the 'perfect flour.' Our friend, like others who seem to be standing still and waiting, may be in this period of tempering—being made fit for the Master's use, 'perfected,' chastened, purified. A poet has said, 'They also serve who only stand and wait.' Even Moses was kept in the wilderness for forty years."

The First Step of the Journey: New York to Vancouver

THE hardest subject for an American to write about is America. If he travels in Palestine, there is the trusty Baedeker and the scholarly George Adam Smith to help him out and keep him from getting his dates mixed. If rope is his tramping ground, he can quote his guide in dialect, giving touches he and there that are intended to remind one of Mark Twain and Ferguson. Ot r parts of the world are so little known by Americans that he can use his im ination, and if he transposes Akbar and Shah Jehan, or ascribes Japanese ar o a man who died three hundred years before the specimen was fashioned, no e is the wiser except the expert and she (it is usually a she) derives so much pl ure from correcting a printed statement that the writer gives pleasure by hi ery mistakes, and does very little harm.

t—if he places the battle of Bunker Hill on the wrong day or the wrong la scape, some grammar-school child is going to show him up, and the parents of e child will then get down the history books they studied years before and ve y the statements of their children. As the editor of the Christian Herald to me, when I sold him an ar le on the unknown Hittites, " one can write articles about th Hittites, but it takes a good m to describe New York to N Yorkers." I agree with hi absolutely. It takes not only a od man but a brave one to de ribe New York to New Y kers.

New Yorker and I were discu ng the wonderful lighting ef ts of the Panama Pacific E sition last fall, and in the co e of the conversation I le ned that she had never crossed th iver to Jersey City at night, n had she ridden across the B oklyn Bridge when the jagged sk ine of Manhattan was touched w the spirit flames of modern sc nce. Californians read of B dway and New Yorkers talk a think of the Rockies, and it is ly the prosaic Iowan or the m from Idaho who gazes across hi own bit of earth and says, " ll, I call that a pretty fair er."

nagine an American, who has vi ed the ruins at Baalbek and F tepur Sikri, describing the ra vay stations at Albany or St. P l! Imagine the collector of v mes on the land of Dickens, S kespeare or Heine buying b ks about the Ford factory or t home of Shredded Wheat! W know all about the Gothic, the Perpendicular and the Elizabethan st es of architecture, but when we buy a dining-room set we judge it on t basis of how much down and how long at a dollar a week.

et America has its charms. Yesterday there were three pretty girls in one P man who would attract attention on Broadway any day. The men would t k of them as fresh in a nice way, and the women would think of them as "so d erent—and impossible!" Their skirts answer that description, being the le th our mothers wore before the war made dress goods come so high. In N York, the war is blamed for everything. It was not till I reached Chicago t I read the sign: "Fast color guaranteed. (In spite of the war.)"

I STOPPED off in Chicago to see an old friend, one of the cheeriest men I ever knew. When I was a kid in college, he printed my first literary effusions and w downright friendly. He is really a wicked man, for he smokes. I should not a ciate with him. But somehow a minute's talk with him, a look into his steady eyes—which he has a habit of winking unconsciously—a hurried mention of the chubby youngster that is his main delight and a grip of his firm hand, makes the whole world good to live in. He is a living interpretation of Browning, for to know him and see him is to feel that "all's right with the world." He dashes off "Bab Ballads," and his philosphy of life is expressed in a little verse which he wrote to me when I was in Jerusalem:

> "When trouble sort o' gets your goat
> And splits yer joy in half,
> Jest quirk yer face and grit yer teeth
> And laugh and laugh and laugh."

I went out to the great new Municipal Pier at Chicago. It is not quite finished yet, but the idea is magnificent, and it is worth a lot to sit out there away from the noise of the city and have a man with a megaphone shout in your ear, "An hour's ride on the lake for a dime! We start right away. ALL-LL A-BOARD!" The pier is also most popular with a certain type of flying bug. It should be a seventh heaven for an "emptyologist." There is a great hall at the end of the pier which is designed for big conventions and parties, so that old and young may be accommodated to let off steam in a sane manner under wholesome supervision.

I have said harsh things about the New York subway, but after riding a week on the various means of transportation which Chicago affords I can find little to criticize in a means of getting there that does not require an engagement book to remind the traveler of the place he started for. Chicago uses its parks more than most cities, and they merit the care that is lavished on them. Art mingles with commerce on the lake front, but the parks can be reached from the homes.

To get into Iowa is to feel at home. Iowa is peopled by "Rubes." The more I see of the smart New Yorker, the more I love the "Rube." A "Rube," as I understand it, is a man who has not forgotten how to be human. I visited a lot of them in Iowa and had the time of my life. I rode behind three horses and in a sweet-running motor, all in one afternoon. Iowa takes its education in colleges instead of cabarets, and the effect is easily seen. It is a wealthy state—and that is not so easily seen. Iowans have learned that a dollar in the bank is worth two in the earring, and you may be condescending to an Iowan capitalist without knowing that he could buy you out and use you for a hitching post for his horses.

You won't have to travel in this manner, but our author may at times

ONE advantage a writer has over the rest of the world is that he has the power of second thought. You know how many times you might have cracked such a good joke if you had only thought of it at the time instead of the next day. I had breakfast at the Merchant's Hotel in St. Paul. The waitress was as kind as though she knew who I was and I wasn't that one. She showed me to a table directly under an electric fan, and brought my order quite quickly. It was shredded wheat, and the cream for it arrived in one of those ironstone thimbles that hold a tablespoonful of liquid. I glanced at the two thirsty biscuits and at the drop of cream in that pitcher.

I asked, "Mary, do you belong to a church?"

"Why, yes, sir," she answered, "I am an Episcopalian."

"That explains it," said I. "But I am a Baptist. Mary, I don't want those biscuits sprinkled. I want them immersed." I finally succeeded, but she charged me extra for the cream. It served me right for differing in matters of religion.

Of course, this joke did not occur to me until the next morning while I was shaving and just then the train gave a lurch. I gave a laugh, and as I do not use a safety I nearly peeled my Adam's apple.

On the Great Northern, even the head waiter in the dining-car is human. East of the Mississippi, a dining-car superintendent is as dignified as a freshman marshal at the commencement exercises. The freshman is afraid that some frivolous classmate will hail him as he passes, so he freezes his facial expression until the ordeal is over. The skipper of a New England diner does the same thing for fear some one will ask him why, when strawberries are ten cents a basket, they should cost thirty cents a dozen on the diner, and why, unless the cow is a prize-winner, milk should cost fifteen cents a glass.

But on the Great Northern you can get a really good meal for seventy-five cents, so the chairman of the receiving committee (anything over a dime graciously received) can afford to be friendly. He wears glasses in the form of new moons, with the horns up, and has the general appearance and actions of a Sunday school superintendent on Children's Day. He leaned across the table to whisper to the little lady across from me, who had been much benefited by a touch of color on cheek and throat. "Just a touch of sunburn. Not painful, I hope." Whereupon she showed even a deeper color, which was really quite charming.

High Speed Sight-Seeing at Glacier

The trouble with American tourist agents is that they lack imagination. Armed with a letter to the head entertainer of Glacier, I told him that I was representing the Christian Herald, and that as I had only one day to spend in the park, I wanted that day to be a "blinger," which is Choctaw for "Paradise." Mr. Noble had been busy with a very efficient little woman whose trip had been mixed up because a late season had left snow in the passes, but he gave me every attention that an American is capable of giving to anything outside the routine task.

Factories in Japan are usually barred to the public; but we shall peer into some

No wonder Americans don't "see America first" more than they do. After a man has commited to the city six days a week for four years, he hates to have his sight-seeing mapped out as a matter of so many coupons and so many punches. The trouble with our American system is that one sees the system before he sees the thing that the system is to serve.

I went up to Mr. Noble, told him that my heart had been examined and that the board of underwriters had licensed me for any kind of roughing it that the Rockies could furnish a man in one day. I told him to load me up with all the scenery my system could absorb before the Oriental Limited came to bear me away, and what did he do? He sold me a set of coupons!

In an hour or two, when the grandmothers and kiddies have had their eight-course breakfast, I am entitled to climb aboard a luxurious motor car and be wafted past $8 worth of scenery "on beds of ease," as it were. I have been riding on that kind of bed all the way from New York, and what I need is something to take the kinks out of my legs and unfurl a few more feet of canvas in my left lung.

NOW, suppose that instead of the well-fed and well-paid Mr. Noble (who is a thorough gentleman), I had had Aboosh, the inimitable, as my guide and he had done it up in Syrian fashion. Aboosh carried Norman Duncan and other celebrities through the Holy Land, and has the imagination that makes Americans leave their happy homes to be dragged by a dragoman from one run-down village to another in Palestine.

At three o'clock in the morning, Aboosh would be at my bedside whispering, "Wake up, man; what for do you sleep till noon? Do you think this is one of your American rest cures? Hot coffee and leben ready. Hurry up!"

By the time the rosy-fingered dawn began to chase the mantle of night toward the west, we would be swinging up some steep mountainside, our wiry horses starting pebbles to rolling and jumping down the steep side of the cliff. Sunrise would see us at the top of the divide, gazing off over a jumble of ragged nature crowded into a jagged mass. Down on the other side we would go, fording a crystal stream and splashing diamond drops on the emerald banks and then riding like mad across a level plain. By that time we would have reached the automobile road, and there would be waiting the cook with his charcoal brazier, with an outdoor breakfast that John D. would give a million to enjoy.

During the night, Aboosh would have telephoned ahead and had every Indian, bear, mountain goat and humming-bird driven to a spot where it could be seen from the speeding auto. We would use the auto only for the speed we could get out of it, and as we neared the lake where the châlets were and where the grandmas and children would get out and exclaim, we would drop off and beat our way through the underbrush to a spot where we could strip and swim in the icy stream with the warm sun for a towel afterward. Then we'd ride again, up over a sloping hillside, to look down on the saucy little châlets and the ant-like crowds in their automobile dusters. A real Indian canoe would be waiting to take us out to meet the launch, and as the lithe native of these savage wilds plied his paddle in the limpid waters, he would sing the rowing song of his forefathers.

At the other end of the lake we would forego the dainty meal served from spotless napery. Lying flat beside some clear, cold brook, we would drink our fill and start to climb again. Our guide this time would be the champion Munchausen of the park, stringing stories together like false pearls in a Tecla window. Our eyes would bulge and our hearts stand still as, in the midst of his recital, a band of Blackfeet, hideous with war paint, would suddenly swoop down upon us and demand the coupons from our leader's box of cigarettes.

By late afternoon, when the auto had brought us nearly back to the great log hotel, we would again dismount and, climbing another mountain pass, would see the red sun sink behind the Continental Divide. And when we were once more rushing on toward the Pacific, and enjoying the delights of straight-backed civilization, we might hum in unison, if not in harmony, "When you come to the end of a perfect day."

Anyway, that is the song that I did hum, and the day deserved it. If there was ever more perfect weather in the world I never met it. Last year, I sat in the great log hotel at Glacier Park and watched it rain. On the night before I reached there this time, there was a cloudburst, and it looked as though the only entertainment we could enjoy would be a gondola party or aquatic sports.

But the day dawned clear and bright and peaceful, with the smell of bacon and coffee coming from the sunny dining-room, and with the snow-blotched mountains gazing down majestically on this six-hundred-foot hotel which had come to act as an introduction to the beauties of the American Rockies at the Continental Divide.

THE Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it is to see that no one carves intertwined hearts or initials on the forests of the park, says that the park has an area of 915,000 acres, but the indefinite thing about it is that he does not explain whether those acres are horizontal, diagonal or perpendicular. It has more acres tipped up at about the angle of your dressing-mirror than any place I ever saw. The experts say they can tell where the Continental Divide comes, and I will not dispute them; but I dare any ordinary mortal to tell the direction of the Rockies in Glacier National Park. There is no fixed range, like the Lebanon. The mountain peaks are not strung together. They are scattered. Among them there are eighty glaciers; 250 lakes; more than fifty main peaks, a good many Indians; lots of guides, and mighty few tourists.

Such as these will entrance you while they stand and gaze at your strange skin and costumes

The only persons who seem to appreciate G ier National Park are those who have been there. I ery one of them swears that he or she is going bacl A reunion of the admirers of this new national ayground in the year 1966 will include most of the pulation of the United States, but just at present ost of that wonderful scenery, those enormous trou nd that health-giving air is just going to waste. The morning gathering in one of the wide-stret ing dining-rooms looks like an executive comn tee meeting before the real crowd has arrived. At at every train brings in loads of unbelievers and c ies away scores of unsatisfied lovers, who swear that ey will renew the suit as soon as conditions pe it.

We shall ascend Fuji and gaze into its angry crat

They are people you can talk with. They are o the hectic seekers for diversion, but the ea s seekers for a deeper communion with a mighty n world. Amid such scenes, smiles blossom as re ily as do the varicolored flowers that carpet the hill les below the milky green of the glaciers. Goodw is so cheap that no one could sell it at New York pr es. And this wonderland is directly beside the trac of a main-line railway. From train to train, I as there less than twenty-four hours; but I saw re Alpine scenery than I did in weeks in Switzerlanc

It is an impertinence to describe the park aft so short a stay, but just let me tell you what I d in ten of those twenty-four hours—ten hours of ue recreation amid the glories of Nature. Sixty- ur miles of riding past an ever-changing panoram of snowy peaks, continuously arranging themselves to vistas of unchanging interest. Now, a dozen poi ed peaks would divide the attention; again, a s gle snowy point would look down at us through the ta of towering pines, beneath which we sped on a d which the driver called "a boulevard compared th what it was last year." I have seen better r ds, but we averaged 13 miles of p climbing and coasting for e ry hour we rode, and our ten-passe er bus followed a touring car closel all the way.

After three hours of delightful ding, we dismounted at the little g p of châlets at the foot of St. Mary's l ke and rode up that beautiful little l ly of water on a power launch for n miles.

Shades of Sir Walter, Loch Kat e, Coilantogle Ford and the Hotel cAlpin! If there is a prettier lake ywhere in the world than St. Mary I want to see it. The Thunersee aff ds distant views of the Bernese Oberl d, that might be as fine if the mount s bathed their feet in the clear gree of the lake, as they do at St. Ma s. The Lake of the Four Cantons aff ds much the same view, as one n rs Flüelen. But as the tiny boat bou ds through the spray on its way to Go gto-the-Sun Mountain, one cannot lp but feel, "Switzerland and the Ca adian Rockies may all be very well, it this is my own, my native land, d, believe me, it's bully!"

When I saw pictures of t se precipitous mountains overawing le picturesque châlets, I said, "Those re telephoto landscapes and the m ntains are really not so close or so h h as t y seem"; but when I got there, I seriously ons ered climbing to the great green glacier on the opes of Siyeh Mountain while the others were at l ch. But the beauties I had already met fine ing heap big chief Three Bears and o Chicago girls who gazed at him admiration while I snapped the shut and let the graflex do the rest) had hausted my supply of films. So I sat own with the old folks and ate, farm ashion, with the table loaded with od things and every one helping his ghbor and then filling his own plate ith delicious food.

On he ride out, we had as our driver a fin oung fellow from the University of M nesota. It was his second trip, and e rain of the night before had mad he road soapy and skiddish. I enjo d the ride because I sat beside him d he let me toot the horn on the hairp turns. If I were nineteen and could rive a car and wanted a vacation that d remember for life, I'd apply for t job of nursing one of those ten-passe ger cars over the auto road beside ose hoary peaks.

On he way back, we had a driver who ew the road as well as I know y to my mouth when there is am on my fork. To ride with as to be thrilled without being His speedometer needle vi-rat from fast to slow like the um on the hall clock. He would t the landscape like a knight at and slow to a crawl when a rough place pe ed. As we bowled over the Divide with our -screeching, up over the skyline jumped another s with a stalwart driver.

"Th at's Red Jackson, captain-elect of the University C ago football team and the most popular man in rk," said our driver. "He came here last year, owing how to handle a steering wheel; but you teach that boy something. He was open to advice from every one, from the bell boys to the Chief Ranger, and he's one of the best drivers now. He's a thoroughbred, that boy, and play football, say!"

Well, we are nearing Seattle and are still boring a hole in some of the finest scenery on the continent. I have been admiring it since four o'clock this morning. We have passed through Skyhomish and Snohomish and I have properly shocked the fine gentleman who thought them the most barbarous of names by telling him that I come from "Kalamazoomich." The porter will soon be brushing my hat, and wondering how much I will tip him for bringing me this table upon which my little typewriter skids around with all the abandon of an auto on the Campus Martius when the asphalt is slippery.

"The Beauties I met included heap big chief Three Bears and two Chicago girls" (girls?)

But I look back upon that day in Glacier Park as the most accessible and condensed sightseeing I ever experienced. One can hike through that great park, making easy stages and having the time of his life, for three dollars a day. Or he can pack his own grub and sleep in the flower-beds, with mountain goats and grizzlies for company, for a dollar or so. There is no side trip necessary to take him to the beginning of his sight-seeing. The big engine carries him direct to the starting-point, and his holiday can begin at once.

The giant log hotel has Indian tepees, Alaskan totem poles, Japanese lanterns, Turkish baths, and an Alpine-clad set of waitresses. A solitary Jap with a ramshackel 'rickshaw meets the trains. The hotel is like the railway, for it is as international as the meat sauce I had in Spokane, which is called "International" because, with a spoonful of that on the tongue of a man, no one nation can hold him. Without leaving the train one can go to Inverness or Ayr, Carlisle or Riga. Devil's Lake is near Church's Ferry, and from Karlsruhe to Genoa is only nineteen miles. Calais and Glasgow, Madras and Zurich are all possible in a few hours, and a stop at Havre (pronounced Have 'er) is made on the way to Bombay. Bremen and Hamburg are vis-à-vis, but it seems discordant soon after to slide into Norfolk. Concentration is the keynote all along the line. A single day at Glacier is the experience of a lifetime.

THE next letter from Mr. Williams will give his impressions while crossing the Pacific, both grave and gay. He then writes from Japan itself, which country he is endeavoring to conquer by the aid of a most human but unruly motorcycle with experiences that only he can adequately describe.

Speaking of Whales

A ı n is scarcely a mouthful for this fish

THERE is one story in the Bible which has perhaps aroused more controversy than any other. In the days following the French Revolution, when both in Europe and America there was a concerted assault upon the truth of the Scriptures, the story of Jonah was the favorite starting-point for those who would discredit the insp d word of God. Voltaire, Tom Paine, and in ate days Bob Ingersoll, made Jonah's whale do veo n service in their attacks upon the Bible. And in th r day and ever since, the faith of a great many peop has suffered shipwreck just at this point. Paine, Inge oll and the rest overlooked the fact, perhaps purpose , that the vehicle by which the fleeing prophet was turned to land and to the realizatio that he could not flee from the face f God was not denominated a wha in the original prophecy, which says at the Lord prepared a great fish.

T whale or great fish is, after all, only n incident in the story of the first oreign missionary, and it is a mat of extreme regret that the ques on which has seemed to cloud the acity of the Book has kept many from ppreciating its evangelical lesson. The principal attacks upon the stor were based upon the fact that scien had discovered that the whale's thro was so small that it could not poss ly swallow a man. It is not hard for ose who have realized God's prov ence to believe that it was within t power of God to prepare a great fish r the special purpose of carrying Jon back to his mission. But it is goo o know that there existed without ubt, at the time of Jonah's experi ce, a fish which might easily have perf med the task allotted to the grea fish of Scriptural history. This fish the whale-shark.

T first known mention of this shar was in 1828, when one was seen off the Cape of Good Hope. The fish was harpooned and brought ashore, and Dr. Andrew Smith, surgeon to the troops stationed in South Africa, found that the fish belonged to the shark family. It was given the scientific name of Rhinodon. Dr. Smith described it fully, and his description would cover, except in the dimensions, all of the specimens since seen. The fish had short, slender, gently curved teeth disposed in rows in both jaws. Its mouth was at the front of and extending the full width of the head, and was very large. The body color was a greenish gray above, with spots and numerous white lines, and beneath reddish white, changing to red. The spots were white or light yellow, varying in size from that of a dime to a half dollar. The length of the specimen caught in 1828 was fifteen feet and the circumference nine feet. The skin was forwarded to the Paris Museum.

In 1858 the Smithsonian Institution received the jaws and vertebræ of a whale-shark which had been taken in the Gulf of California. In 1870, D. Perceval Wright, a naturalist, made extensive studies of the whale-shark in the Indian Ocean, reporting that some had been measured which exceeded forty-five feet in length. He made photographs of two specimens, and proved that this shark, while a true shark, was the largest of living animals except the north whale, and that it was not a carnivorous but an herbivorous fish. According to Wright, it was entirely harmless, never attacked nor molested men.

In 1883 a whale-shark was taken near Colombo, Ceylon. The mouth of this shark was three feet wide. The specimen was dissected, but unfortunately no detailed data as to the size of the internal organs appear to have been kept. In the same year, 1883, a whale-shark was captured in the Gulf of Panama. In 1902 a whale-shark was driven ashore at Ormond, Fla., this being the first record of the appearance of the fish on the eastern coast of America.

The most recent capture of a whale-shark, and one which has been featured somewhat in various publications, was near Knight's Key, Fla., June 1, 1912. This whale-shark was captured by Captain Charles Thompson, of Miami, Fla., Captain Thompson and his boat, the Samoa, being under charter to Mr. Charles T. Brooks of Cleveland, Ohio, for tarpon fishing. On the morning of June 1, the captain saw the tail of a large shark near the viaduct of the Florida East Coast Railway. The boat was sent in close to the fish, which was moving slowly along parallel to the viaduct with its tail above water. The fish was harpooned at half past nine in the morning, and Captain Thompson called for aid from some fishermen who happened to be near. During the course of the day, several lines were made fast to the fish. He was shot in the back forty or fifty times with a rifle, and was killed with a knife attached to a pole. Captain Thompson realized the value of his find, and arranged at once to tow the great shark to Miami, where it was put on exhibition. Later the skin was carfully mounted, and since early in 1913 has been on exhibition in different parts of the country.

Forty-five feet of skilled taxidermy which enables the observer to appreciate something of the size and power of the whal -shark

The specimen taken by Captain Thompson is about forty-five feet long and the girth about eighteen feet. The mouth is so large that a man could crouch within it easily, and the throat was said to have been fully large enough to permit the passing of a man of ordinary size. The fish feeds by moving slowly through the water with its mouth open.

The fact that there is a fish big enough to have swallowed a man makes foolish the arguments of those who questioned the story of Jonah, basing their criticism upon the size of the throat of the fish mentioned in the only New Testament reference to the fish that carried Jonah.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

JAPAN A TRADITIONAL FRIEND. In a recent interview, reported in the New York Times, Baron Yoshiro Sakatani, a former mayor of Tokyo, and Japanese delegate to the economic conference of the Allies, discussed the Japanese attitude toward the new American navy and the American policy of Oriental exclusion. The baron said: "When any great power begins to increase its armament on a sudden and gigantic scale, it is a matter of great concern to other powers to know the motive. Because of the location of the United States, protected by wide oceans, Japan saw no direct necessity for America's great new naval program. But the friendship of the two peoples is traditional. It was right, it is right, that this friendship should accomplish good. Japan, too, is building for its navy. Now, when both sides understand that the other's greater navy is for defensive purposes, the concern of the other for the motive back of the increase ceases." The baron was asked, "Whom does Japan fear?" His answer was, "Whom does the United States fear?" In regard to the matter of Japanese immigration to this country, he said he thought the question had passed the point of crisis and that it would be settled amicably in time, but that Japan felt it must be settled, and that it must be settled justly, with due regard to the dignity of Japan, which is willing to prevent its laborers from coming to this country as a matter of friendship, but objects to their exclusion on a basis of race. According to a staff correspondent of the Evening Mail, the foreign embassies in Peking have come to realize that American influence in China, as a result of failure in the United States to come vigorously to the support of China in her controversy with Japan, is rapidly diminishing. The diplomatic corps is said to consider the Root-Takahira agreement dead.

The Japanese are said to be further tightening their grip on China by demanding that Japanese inspectors supervise the collection of the land tax which is to be offered as security for Japan's share of the $50,000,000 loan now being sought by China. This loan was originally to have been arranged by a group of bankers representing American, British, Russian, French, German and Japanese financiers. Because of the war situation, the German group cannot now participate. This fact may prevent the participation of the United States, since the agreement of the American bankers bound them to participate with the other five groups, and the possible change in the identity of the groups because of the war situation may cause the withdrawal of the American group for reasons of neutrality.

TO BREAK UP THE COAL "TRUST." On September 20 Attorney General Gregory filed briefs in the United States Supreme Court appealing from the decision of the District Court in Pennsylvania which refused to dissolve the Reading Company and the Lehigh Valley Railroad from their coal holdings. The two roads have also appealed from the decree which, while refusing the main contention of the government, required the two roads to dispose of their securities of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey and the Lehigh-Wilkesbarre Coal Company. The government's brief in its appeal to the Supreme Court charges that the history of the Anthracite Coal Companies is "permeated with illegality and characterized by deliberate purpose to drive others from the field, resulting in increased prices out of proportion to increased production costs. At the current rate of mining, coal areas of these companies combined together will outlast by many years those of any competitor. This combination, if not dissolved, will therefore, some day, own or control every ton of commercially available anthracite."

These men of the famous Seventy-First N. Y. Infantry returned to their armory on September 23 to be mustered out of the Federal service on October 2, unless strike developments prevented. Their place on the border was taken by a regiment from a southern state. On September 27 six thousand more troops were ordered from state camps to the border and 10,000 were ordered returned to their homes to be mustered out. This order marks the first reduction in the force of National Guardsmen on the border, which has been kept at about 100,000 men.

It is said that no lawyer has ever been Lord Mayor of London, although nearly every other trade or profession has been represented.

mpathetic Strike Fails. The sy athetic strike which the union lea rs of New York City had atte ted to organize in the interest of th trike of the carmen was a complete fai e on the day set for it, only a few mi r unions with less than 20,000 men go on strike, and of these a considerab number had grievances of their own no elated to the car strike. The car co anies have continued to operate an in ased number of cars, and there has be no serious violence, although there ha been some accidents, due to the ne ousness incident to the strike, and to e inexperience of new men. One su action resulted in a collision of subwa trains on September 25, in which on ar telescoped another, and two perso were seriously injured, the small nu er of injuries being due to the fact th the telescoped car was empty.

r Health Czar. Now that the pa lysis epidemic in New York is subsi g, residents of the city and its su rbs are beginning to take stock of th acts of various health boards, and it probable that the autocratic auth ity now held by boards of health will be odified in future. A case in point is th of the nine-year-old child of Mrs. A n Anderson of Jamaica, Long Is id. Health physicians pronounced th hild's illness infantile paralysis, and or red him taken to the Isolation Hospi . Competent physicians, on the ot r hand, pronounced the case mala , and the parents refused to permit the child to be taken from its home, several times thwarting efforts of the health authorities to take him. Representatives of the Health Board, however, succeeded in gaining entrance to the house during the absence of the parents, and forcibly removed the child to the hospital. As a result of this arbitrary act, a bill will be introduced into the next Assembly of New York limiting the powers of boards of health, particularly as regards the entering of a private house and the forcible removing of a patient. It has been charged that, by a special ruling, a member of the New York Board of Health was permitted to keep his own child, ill with the disease, under quarantine at home, although scant consideration was given to the pleas of other parents equally well able to insure proper isolation of the case. The epidemic is still on the wane, although September 27 and 28 were marked by a slight increase in cases. The New York City schools opened September 25 as scheduled but with about 90,000 absentees. Many parents feared to take the possible risk.

Belligerents Insist War Must Go On

DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE, British Secretary of State for War, in an interview which has been cabled throughout the world, and Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg, in an address before the Reichstag, both in the closing days of September, have given to the world their respective countries' state of mind as respects the continuance of the war, the most significant passages from each being as follows:

(LLOYD-GEORGE)

BRITAIN has only begun to fight; the British Empire has invested thousands of its best lives to purchase future immunity for civilization; this investment is too great to be thrown away.

Sporting terms are pretty well understood wherever English is spoken.. I am quite sure they will be understood in America.

Well, then, the British soldier is a good sportsman. He enlisted in this war in the sporting spirit—the best sense of that term. He went in to see fair play to a small nation trampled upon by a bully. He is fighting for fair play in international dealings. He has fought as a good sportsman by the thousands. He has died like a sportsman.

Under the circumstances the British, now that the fortunes of the game have turned a bit, are not disposed to stop because of the squealing done by the Germans, or for the Germans, by probably well-meaning but misguided sympathizers and humanitarians.

For two years the British soldier has had a bad time—no one knows so well as he what a bad time it was. He was sadly inferior in equipment. On the average he was inferior in training. He saw the allied cause beaten all about the ring, but he didn't appeal to either the spectators or the referee to stop the fight on the ground that it was brutal, nor did he ask to have the rules changed.

And at this time, under these conditions, what was the winning German doing? Was he worrying over the terrible slaughter? No. He was talking of annexing Belgium and Poland as a result of his "victory," and while he was remaking the map of Europe without the slightest regard for the wishes of its people the British people were preparing to pay the price we knew must be paid for the time to get the army ready.

The whole world, including neutrals of the highest purposes and humanitarians with the best motives, must know that there can be no outside interference at this stage. Britain asked no intervention when she was not prepared to fight. She will tolerate none now that she is prepared until Prussian military despotism is broken beyond repair. There was no regret voiced in Germany over the useless slaughter.

But in the British determination to carry the fight to a decisive finish there is something more than the natural demand for vengeance. The inhumanity, the pitilessness of the fighting that must come before a lasting peace is possible is not comparable with the cruelty that would be involved in stopping the war while there remains a possibility of civilization again being menaced from the same quarter. Peace now or at any time before the final and complete elimination of this menace is unthinkable.

There's neither clock nor calendar in the British army today. Time is the least vital factor. Only the result counts —not the time consumed in achieving it.

It took England twenty years to defeat Napoleon, and the first fifteen of those years were black with British defeat. It will not take twenty years to win this war, but whatever time is required it will be done, and I say this recognizing that we have only begun to win. There is no disposition on our side to fix the hour of ultimate victory after the first success. We have no delusion that the war is nearing an end. We haven't the slightest doubt as to how it is to end.

The world at large has not yet begun to appreciate the magnificence, the nobility, the wonder of France . . . France will stick to the end . . . France has fought the longest wars of any nation of Europe and her history itself is assurance enough that she will hold to the end.

With the British it will be the sporting spirit that will animate the army to the last, fair play the motive—fair fight the method. With the French it will be that fiercely burning patriotism, that will sustain the army to the end, regardless of when the end may come.

And Russia.
Will go through to the death.

(BETHMANN-HOLLWEG)

SINCE the beginning of July, English and French attacks on the Somme have raged almost without interruption. The common offensive of the Entente enemies wanted to break through the front of the hated Germans, free France and Belgium and carry the war across the Rhine into Germany.

But what our enemies hoped and attempted did not succeed.

On the Eastern front the great Russian attempt to break through was stopped by the troops of Archduke Charles and General von Linsingen.

In the Balkans the Entente Powers planned to split our alliance, to interrupt communication between Germany and the Near East, to crush Bulgaria, Turkey and Austria-Hungary, one after the other, and then to throw all their forces against isolated Germany.

The situation of our faithful, brave allies is unshaken.

To sum up: On the Somme front there have been isolated hostile successes, which, however, do not change the general situation. Otherwise a successful defense has been made against all hostile attacks, and thus the enemy attempts have been thwarted. In the Balkans the hostile plan failed. Thus the enormous war goes on.

The aims proclaimed by our enemies are becoming increasingly clear and admit of no misunderstanding. They are lust of conquest and annihilation. It is proposed to give Constantinople to Russia, Alsace-Lorraine to France, the Trentino and Trieste to Italy and Transylvania to Rumania.

The Chancellor said that Germany had declared her readiness for peace negotiations on December 9, 1915, and on several occasions subsequently.

We did our duty, he continued. Does any one dare ask that today we make proposals to our enemies, inasmuch as M. Briand a short time ago said that consideration of peace now would be a humiliation and a disgrace to the memory of the dead?

The French Prime Minister said in one of his latest speeches that France is fighting for a firm and lasting peace, in which the freedom of nationalities will be protected by international agreements against all attacks. We, too, desire this. We wish to protect Germany forever against every attack.

But does M. Briand—united with our enemies even before the war in an alliance of French thirst for revenge, Russian lust of conquest and the British policy of isolating Germany and dominating the whole world, an alliance that desires to annihilate, attempts to boycott and shapes its entire policy not only for the period of the war but for the time after the war—does M. Briand believe that this prepares soil from which could grow international agreements granting to nations liberty, honor, dignity and peaceful collaboration for the sake of humanity and progress? Or does M. Briand really believe he can obtain this lofty ideal in time by a war of annihilation in which the last of the youth of France is perishing on the devastated battlefields of Verdun and the Somme?

What Great Britain wants to make of Germany is shown by the British without any possibility of doubt. They want to destroy our national life. The Germany which England wants to lay at her feet is a country without military defense, a country crushed economically, boycotted by the entire world and sentenced to lasting economic infirmity.

When this German competition shall have been eliminated, when France has lost all her blood, when all her allies of war must toil as England's slaves in financial affairs, when the neutral world of Europe must follow each English command and submit to every British blacklist, then England will build on devastated Germany her dream of English world dominion.

This is the aim for which England is fighting with forces and means unparalleled in her history, adding one breach of international law to another. Therefore, England is our most egoistic, our most bitter and our most tenacious enemy.

A German statesman who would refrain from using against this enemy every proper

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON the Picardy section of the western front during the past week (September 23-30) the Allies made the greatest advance toward the capture of their primary objectives, Bapaume and Peronne, which they have made in any equal length of time since their offensive began on July 1. This was achieved by a simultaneous movement eastward and northward by the French and British, and is remarkable in that it was the first movement on this front with the characteristic of simultaneousness which has really worked with scientific accuracy, and the result was most successful, both in the amount of territory wrested from the enemy and, what is more important, tactically.

The village of Bouchavesnes lies on the Bethune road, the highway connecting Peronne and Bapaume, about 3½ miles directly north of Peronne. A short two miles north of Bouchavesnes is Rancourt. The importance of this highway connecting Peronne and Bapaume was very considerable to the Germans, as thereby they were able to move troops and supplies conveniently and rapidly from either of these towns to their positions at any point between the two places.

Last week, the French had secured a more or less precarious foothold in both Rancourt and Bouchavesnes and thus had to a degree commanded the road. This foothold, however, was converted into a firm possession after three days of very severe fighting, and furthermore the French succeeded in moving a considerable distance, half to three-quarters of a mile, to the east of both the two towns and the road between them.

From Bouchavesnes south to Peronne, the line previously established curved rather sharply to the west on leaving Bouchavesnes, and then moderated its curve farther south, finally reaching the Somme River about a mile to the west of Peronne. Directly north of Peronne is a hill of considerable size known as Mount St. Quentin, which has been very heavily fortified by the Germans, and which must be taken before Peronne can fall, as it commands not only the town itself but all the approaches to the town from the west and south, and thus constitutes a problem of considerable gravity for the French to solve. On this line from Bouchavesnes to the point west of Peronne, there was also very hard fighting during the week, but thereon the German defense held firm, and the French made practically no gains.

Returning northward to Rancourt. At the beginning of the week under consideration, the Allies' line, which from Peronne to Rancourt had run north and south, turned at the latter place sharply, slightly to the southwest, and ran in this direction a little over two miles to the southerly houses of Combles, and thence around Combles on three sides. As we said last week, this position doomed Combles to fall, and this doom became a fact this week.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD PULPIT
"THAT CHRIST MAY BE ALL AND IN ALL"

The Fellowship of Suffering

A SERMON BY REV. A. C. DIXON, D.D.

TEXT—Phil. 3 : 10. "That I may know him and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death."

Rev. A. C. Dixon pastor in the famou Spurgeon pulpit, Metropolitan Tabernacle London, was born in North Carolina in 1854 and entered the Baptis ministry in 1876; goin to London in 1911 afte pastorates in Baltimore, Brooklyn, Boston and Chicago.

OUT of the text come four words of great importance: Substitution, Identification, Conformity and Resurrection. Christ died for us. He gave himself for us. Instead of us. That is a perfectly legitimate translation. He took our place. He bore our sin in his own body on the tree. And after we have accepted Christ as our Substitute, then there comes in our experience an identification with him in his suffering and in his joy. And the thought of the text, taking for granted substitution, is that of identification: to know the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his suffering. Christ makes himself one with us. Truly human, truly divine. Very man, very God. And now he would have us make ourselves one with him, and especially one with him on the cross, and all that that means. He is one with us in everything except sin. And to know the fellowship of his suffering is our great privilege.

The fellowship, first, of his physical suffering. Peter in his sermon said that Jesus was raised from the dead, having loosed himself from the bonds of death—the physical bonds of death. He bore our sicknesses and diseases. And when you suffer in body and estate, when you suffer for Christ, you know him in the fellowship of his physical suffering. The martyrs were conscious that they were suffering with their suffering Lord and that he was suffering with them. He was in the fire or in the water with them. They were suffering in identification with him. When they were struck, Christ was struck. That is what the voice from heaven meant to Saul, "Why persecutest thou me? In persecuting my people at Damascus you are persecuting me. I am one with them." It is something when you suffer physical agony to know you can know the fellowship of Christ. Every pain points out Calvary. Every pain points to the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ not only bore our guilt, but in a very true sense bore our pain.

THE fellowship of Christ's suffering comes of the refusal to alleviate pain. While he was hanging there, in agony of body as well as of soul, they mixed a cup of wine and myrrh and offered it to him. Mark tells us he refused the cup, but he received the portion of vinegar. There was nothing intoxicating in that, but the stupefying cup—this cup that would have made him insensible to pain—he refused. One of the memories of my childhood, or rather of early manhood, was listening to an eloquent old preacher in a rural district, and the climax of his sermon on the Atonement was that "the Lord Jesus died on the cross, the hero of total abstinence." He refused to accept what would have alleviated the pain. He refused it, because to have accepted it would have violated the great purpose of his mission. He was there for the purpose of suffering, in order that he might end suffering.

I believe we find the principle in that for the regulation of our daily life. What the world gives us that would prevent us carrying out the purpose of God in our redemption we ought to refuse. The Lord Jesus sets us an example of refusal.

THEN comes the fellowship of suffering caused by my guilt. Jesus suffered my guilt. Can I suffer his guilt? When I have a sense of guilt does he suffer? Can I know the fellowship of suffering on account of guilt? He was numbered with the transgressors. He was the one Person in the world and in all history without sin. But he was counted a sinner, and the suffering that comes from innocence being counted as guilt must be very terrible. For the guilty to suffer the consequence of their guilt is not so excruciating as for the innocent to suffer as though guilty; for while sin tends to coarsen, the refinement of innocence must suffer inexpressibly on account of the guilt of others. And our Lord Jesus suffered on account of the guilt of others. Have you ever suffered on account of the guilt of others? And have you learned to identify yourself with the guilt of others, getting down with it to realize what it is? Have you known Christ in the fellowship of suffering on account of the guilt of others?

I saw a poor fellow in the prisoner's dock, being tried for the violation of a law. He said, "Guilty." And as I looked into the sad face, marred by sin, I could but say, "That man knows the fellowship of guilt." O friend, if you just trust in Christ, he bears your guilt. Am I willing to go into the cell with that man, to sit beside him and be reckoned just as guilty as he is, and in sympathy with his broken life, to try to build it up, to try to win him to Jesus Christ? That is what is meant by knowing the fellowship of his suffering on account of the guilt of others: getting side by side with the guilty, the men or the women, that you may make them good. That is what the Lord Jesus did. That is what he would have us to do.

I HAVE a friend who has won to Christ a poor drunkard. The man was a sot, and he kept out of the way for a long time. But my friend, walking along the streets of New York one day, saw that man go into a saloon. What did he do? Lift his head and walk by scornfully? Get angry? Go off and tell the office-bearers of the church that the fellow was not worthy of a place on the church roll? He did not. He went right through the door of that saloon, walked up to the man's side as he was about to take a drink of alcohol, put his hand on his shoulder, and said: "Don't, don't." The man looked rather surprised, and he said: "I cannot help it. My thirst is like fire." "Yes, but you can help it. I am coming with you to help you. Come along with with me." He went to the man's room and stayed with him all night—put himself in his place and fought the battle with him. That is knowing the fellowship of guilt that you may save from guilt. It is becoming like the Lord Jesus, in the effort to rescue the lost.

THEN there is the fellowship of Christ's suffering that is caused by shame. "For the joy that was set before him he endured the cross, despising the shame." The most shameful death any one ever died was crucifixion. It was the death of the slave. No free-born Roman could be crucified. And connected with crucifixion there was great ignominy. There was the scoffing and sneering of the high priests round the cross, the shame of the crucifixion and the reviling of the crowd, and the Lord Jesus bore it all for us. Can I know him in the fellowship of his suffering of shame and scorning and mocking?

A member of this church, in a conversation, incidentally mentioned the fact that she made known she was a Christian in her office, and not a person in the office spoke to her that whole day after she bore her testimony for the Lord Jesus. The name of Jesus was not popular there. And when I talked to her about it, she did not seem unhappy. She had known the fellowship of the suffering of Christ. Are you mocked in the office, ridiculed in your home, scoffed at by your friends? Rejoice in the privilege of knowing the Lord Jesus in the fellowship of his shame, of scoffing, of mockery. As you learn him in that fellowship you will be all the stronger in character.

THEN there is the fellowship of his suffering in rejection. Have you been rejected because he was? "He was despised and rejected of men." Have you been rejected because of unbelief? A friend, who is a pastor in Baltimore, said to me a year ago: "I know what Jesus felt when people told him they did not believe him. I have had men and women tell me they have lost confidence in me." He had some financial trouble, and there were some who were losers by it. People in that community came and said: "I will never believe you again. I have got no use for you. No confidence in you." The tears literally streamed down his face as we knelt in prayer. "Oh, Brother Dixon," he said, "I know for the first time how Jesus felt when people told him they did not believe him."

Well, the Lord Jesus suffered more than he did, because his was innocent suffering. Have you ever had people tell you they did not believe in you, that they had not any confidence in your profession? Have they pursued you with expressions of their unbelief? If so, you have known Christ in the fellowship of rejection, and you may rejoice in the privilege.

THERE is also the fellowship of suffering caused by betrayal. He was betrayed by one of his disciples. When Julius Cæsar saw his former friend in the midst of the conspirators, with a drawn dagger in his hand, there was a dagger in Cæsar's heart even before the steel reached it. Treachery of friendship is about as hard a sting as you may be called upon to bear, especially the treachery of love. With an expression I never shall forget a husband said to me once: "She has proved false. She has proved false." The tragedy of it! The one loved best on earth. "Still I love her," he said.

Yes, and Jesus Christ loved you, and he loves even those that betray. He even loves those that are false to him. Have you ever come into contact with that sort of experience? Those that you trusted have failed you in your Christian life. I am not talking about business relations; but in your Christian life, have you been trusting to a rotten reed which has broken? If so, you begin to know the fellowship of Christ in bet ya

NEXT there is the fellowship of suffering beca e o loneliness. I think I have had half a dozen ople tell me, "In my home I am the only Christian. N another one in the family is a Christian." I t a bright young lady in America whose fathe and mother would not let the pastor call. Once w n I went, the door was shut in my face. The lady one of the most beautiful Christian characters I ver knew. She had fellowship in loneliness with C ist. In that home she lived with a father and a moth who hated Christ. They drank in the spirit of ratio ism and had no faith in the Bible and the Lord sus. There in that home, with plenty of money, sh was lonely. Are you one of that kind? Lonely i the home, alone in the shop, alone in the place of bus ss? Well, if you are, then you are acquainted with C rist in the fellowship of his loneliness.

Now observe what follows: "Being made con rmable unto his death." There is the ideal—confor ble to the death of Christ. That is the ideal of cha ter for the Christian—the spirit that gives itself nto death in living sacrifice for others. It is possi to lose your soul while you live. You can lose th best that is in you while you simply try to prot it. "He that saveth his life shall lose it." How can y be conformable to the death of Christ, that you ay know him and the power of his resurrection? I you are identified with Christ, you will be crucified wit him in some way; and it is the living Christ withi you that will make you glad to suffer.

Fellowship of the suffering of Christ leads ou nto joy. Ruskin tells us that in some mud whi he picked up in a manufacturing town he found our things: he found some clay, some soot, some san and some water. The clay was unsightly, but he beg to work some process and made out of that clay em with the blueness of the sky, that he called a sap ire. That soot, the black carbon, is what diamon are made of. That sand, not beautiful at all, but r ged in parallel lines and under certain conditions, be nes a pearl. The water becomes the snow crystal So out of that mud which he picked up, there are t ngs that can be made by it that are attractive an precious. And out of suffering with Christ there ay come a beauty of character. "For the joy tha vas set before him he endured the cross." It was the oss that made the resurrection glorious, and it is t fellowship of the suffering of Christ that shall make our spiritual resurrection glorious.

IN the streets of an Italian city there walked ad-faced man. Everybody who saw him said, " ha man has been in hell." He wrote a book called he Inferno." There was another Man, a Man of sor ws; the Man that wept with those that wept, and ver people who cared not for his weeping. When p ple saw him pass, they said, "There is a man wh has come from heaven." The difference between nte and Christ is that Dante walked a world of dar ess with no stars in it, while Christ, bearing the w of the world, yet had the very music of heaven in hi oul and flowing out to others.

In New York, as I have heard it said, there an uncut diamond which is a curiosity. And why? Because no lapidary has been found that can cut it No model has been found that can even take a chip om it. Other diamonds have been ground in their ist. but they have not been able to get dust from hat diamond to grind it. It seems harder than any her diamond in the world. It has been under the eel, but it has only worn out the wheel and yet ha not been touched. Oh, friend, is that your heart? I hat the heart of stone that God would have you yi to him? If you have given yourself up to sin until ere is no response to the appeal from Calvary, it is be use your heart is as hard as that uncut diamond. od help you to look up and ask him to shape it. H can do it by the power of Calvary and the open sepu ler.

The Last Bridge

SNDAY, October 15. John 6 : 66. "Many urned back, and walked no more with him." ady Jeunes once asked Mr. Joseph Chamberain why, in his opinion, so many men fall shor of their ambition. And Mr. Chamberlain answ ed, "They come to the place where they turn back They may have killed the dragon at the first bridg and at the second, perhaps even at the third; but e dragons are always more formidable the furth we go. Many turn back disheartened, and very w will meet the monsters to the end. Almost none willing to have a try with the demon at the last idge; but if he does, he has won forever."

Th is a very vivid interpretation of human experie e. But it has a much wider application than the litical world which Mr. Chamberlain had in minc It is supremely true of the highest relationhips even of the loftiest concerns of the soul. Many of u get through the earlier struggles, but we are daun d by the later foes. We get over the Slough of Desp nd, but we dare not face the castle of Beelzebub whic stands just outside the wicket-gate. Or we pass e castle, but we become fearful at the sight of the l ns. Or if the lions are behind us, Apollyon makes a id. And all along the road we meet with pilgrim who are turning back because some new menace has bbed them of their courage. They were wearing he erdons of many victories; but they fearfully esu that this last struggle will be beyond their stre h, and so they turn back, and they lose all their guer ns in their retreat.

Al this is a most unwise and deadly misunderstan ng of our resources. For it is a law of grace that in th Christian life "every conquest won" prepares us fo the next conflict, endowing us with all the needful e ipment. The events in our spiritual life are not a lo mob, a gathering of unrelated fragments, no happ ing having any vital connection with the one that llows on. In God's good grace, the happenings become a series, and each becomes our servant to lead s to the next. When we have slain the lion the ength of the lion is in our loins when we march forw d to meet Apollyon. So that if the dragons do become more formidable as we advance, we are all the stro er to meet them. God will not allow us to be tried bove that we are able.

A it sometimes, nay, it often, happens that the brid we most feared had no defending forces when we ived. "When they were past the first and the seco wards, they came unto the iron gate that lead unto the city, which opened to them of its own ccord, and they went out." That iron gate is ofte the easiest of all! The angel of his presence is with s all along the way, and if we are faithful to his l he will assuredly see us through. J. H. J.

Strength from God's Infinite Supply

MNDAY, October 16. I Sam. 19 : 11-18 and Ps. 59 : 9-17. "O my Strength, I will wait upo hee. . . . Unto thee, O my Strength, will I sing prai s." David was eminently a man of prayer, and man of his psalms contain the prayers offered in hou of difficulty, as they occurred in his romantic hist y. After the stress was over, he embodied his experiences in a psalm. Three times he speaks of God's Strength, probably in the sense of Stronghold. The unted man put God between himself and the hatr of his foes. He was God-encompassed. Paul wou have stated the same fact a little differently. He ould have said, "Your life is hid with Christ in God

Wat a castle-keep must have been in the old freeboo g days, when an army of marauders descended on eaceful valley, and the villages having been forewar d hurried their families and cattle into the stro keep of their chieftain's castle, that the believing ul, by faith, claims God to be. Behind and before bove and below, are the right hand and the left "The Lord is thy keeper. He shall keep thee from all evil. He shall keep thy soul." Let us specially remember that delightful touch in the story of the xodus. "The cloud stood behind them, so that the e came not near the other all the night." All the me that Saul's emissaries were watching around his velling David was quietly reckoning on God's pro ction. He was waiting on God's strength.

My we not imagine him assuring Michal, his wife, tha here was no need to fear, and that, as morning bro , he would have cause to sing aloud of God's mer ? So it befell! As he had waited on God's strength, so now he sang praises to that strength. The God of his mercy had prevented, had gone before him and allowed him to see his desire. Live in God! Thy waiting shall ere long turn to singing! The plots and stratagems of thy foes shall not hold thee! Be of good cheer! F. B. M.

The Directory of Prayer

TUESDAY, October 17. Matt. 14 : 23. "He went up into the mountain apart to pray: and when evening was come, he was there alone." Not long ago, I had an experience that set me to thinking about the use of prayer and periods of meditation. I had an important conference to attend and realized that my time was limited in which to reach the place of my engagement. I found I had somehow mistaken the address, and knowing that I was getting late, I thought to save time by inquiring. Several persons whom I met and asked were ignorant of the building I wanted. Finally I became fretted and ran into a grocery store to inquire if they knew the name of the person I was seeking. The grocery clerk did not seem to know, but he said, "Have you looked in the directory?" He handed me the book, and very soon I located my party and went off wondering why I had not thought to save my time by consulting the directory before.

When one thinks about it, Jesus seemed to use the quiet times of prayer as a spiritual directory. He realized evidently that, despite the needs that pressed upon him from the people whom he came to serve, it saved time to send them away occasionally and betake himself to the still air of the mountain for meditation and prayer.

It is the cure for uncertainty, for spiritual fatigue, and for the perplexing dilemmas that confront us so frequently in our work-filled days. We gain time; we get a telescopic vision of our lives which corrects our microscopic view of petty details upon which so much of our life is engaged. Did you ever see woodmen who work in dense forests, losing their trail, send one of their number to the top of a tall tree to find the pảth again? Prayer is a pathfinder. It reminds us of our true way. It helps us to shape our course afresh.

The Divine Rescuer Ready to Save

WEDNESDAY, October 18. I Sam. 23 : 19; 26 : 19 and Ps. 54. "Save me, O God, by thy name." This is a brief petition, the first in a brief prayer. We can easily understand that, in the hurry of the precipitate flight of 600 men and their families, there would not be time for prolonged devotion: and this petition commemorates the ejaculatory cry that was flung up to God amid the sudden evacuation of the big cave or open camp.

We need to acquire the holy habit of fragmentary prayer, as a link between more stated times of devotion, in order to be found worthy of that beautiful designation given to Cornelius, "He was a devout man, one that prayed alway." Life is full of emergencies. Ambushments of evil may at any moment break forth on us. Questions of conscience need to be decided instantly. We are often face to face with iron gates, and Red Seas, and blank walls. We must act, but how? Like travelers in a pitch-dark night, illuminated only by distant watch-fires and flashing shells, we know not the way to take. Sometimes it seems as though God had contrived our life to create these repeated demands for the sudden uplift of the soul.

God's Name is his character. We have a strong claim on him, when we plead, as Moses so often did, the honor of his great Name. It is as though we said: "Act worthily of thyself." The Gibeonites entrapped Israel into a covenant with themselves, and asked not counsel of the Lord : yet when their crafty allies sent to Joshua saying : "Come up to us quickly, and save us, and help us, for all the kings of the Amorites are gathered against us," Joshua immediately went up with all the men of war to succor them. They could not allow their good faith to be impeached. We also have an irresistible argument when we can say to God: "Save us, for thy honor is at stake."

A Test of Religion

THURSDAY, October 19. Luke 10 : 27. "And thy neighbor as thyself." It is a simple but certain way of testing our religion to say, "How does it affect my attitude to my neighbor?" Jesus in the parable of the Good Samaritan teaches that being a regular adherent to a form of religious observance does not assure an inheritance to eternal life. The priest and the Levite, who paid no attention to their neighbor who was in trouble, were all right as far as adherence to ceremonials was concerned, but the call of humanity aroused no response in their hearts. The Samaritan was a member of a society that was considered inferior to the circle in which the Sanhedrin Jew moved; yet according to Jesus his religion stood the test before which professional religion failed.

It is well that we are placing the emphasis more and more in these times where the Master placed it. He taught that a tree is known by its fruits, and not by the kind of garden in which it happens to be planted. True religion is a life dominated by love for others. It wells up within the soul, and it must overflow its banks. No dikes are high or strong enough to keep in the generous love and light of a Christian's spirit. Christianity is a leaven; it is a sun of warmth and radiant cheer; its light, like God's rain, falls on the evil as well as on the good; its universal neighborliness is its eternal characteristic.

The hour of daily meditation should be a testing hour. Is my religion simply a pious exaltation that makes me "feel good?" Is it simply following the traditional rules of my particular sect? Or is it a great, growing, beneficent thing that makes my neighbor say "I wish I knew the secret of his faith; it seems so glad and free, with all its doors open to the world!" C. S. C.

Seeing with Undimmed Vision

FRIDAY, October 20. I Sam. 24 : 2 and Ps. 17. "Keep me as the apple of the eye." This psalm is headed "A prayer of David," and therefore has a special claim on our attention, this clause in particular.

The whole body appears to recognize the value of the eye. If a blow is descending we instinctively raise our arm to ward it off. It is as though there were a secret understanding among our members that the eye must be saved at any cost. The encasement in which it is set, the veil of the lid, the fringe of eyebrows and eyelashes to catch fluff or minute insects, the lachrymal glands with their tear-wash, the conjoined action of the various parts to expel any intruder, the indication of overstrain by the warning signal of headache—all these are additional symptoms of the extreme value of the eye. The psalmist could hardly have found an expression that more clearly suggests the preciousness of his soul, or the instantaneous act by which God would intercept the greatest or smallest injury from befalling him.

The constant cleansing of the eye from minute grits is specially significant. The miner or collier will engage in his necessary toil for hours, yet at their close, if you encounter him, you will discover that there is one feature of his face which is absolutely unsoiled. His eyes are as bright and clear as when he left his home in the morning, because hour by hour they have been laved by the cleansing tear-water. This is an emblem, surely, of the constant care of God over the soul he loves. "The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth from all sin." As the tides wash our shores day by day, removing our accumulation of refuse, so the tides of God's grace flow in to cleanse away the débris of our hearts. F. B. M.

The Divine Light Shining in the Face

SATURDAY, October 21. Acts 6 : 15. "They saw his face as it had been the face of an angel." Faces are windows through which souls gaze upon each other. They are reprints of character, wireless communicators of love or hate, glory or despair, beauty or ugliness. The face is the photograph of the whole being, especially when the soul intentionally or involuntarily unbosoms itself. The countenance is an open book where the public reads the thoughts, feelings and affections of the individual. Sin has extended its disfigurements to the face, daubing God's image with the mire of the pit. Christ retouches the face into the Godlike likeness when he cleanses the heart. The face stands for all that the soul means, for love looks what it feels.

Dr. Lyman Trumbull, when a boy, saw a beautiful light upon the face of a stranger and found it was Adoniram Judson, the missionary. He never forgot the glory of that beauty to his dying day. So Paul saw the face of Stephen as it had been the face of an angel when he was consenting to his death. That beauty haunted him. The psalmist exclaimed, "When thou saidst, Seek ye my face, my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." E. W. C.

Our Raise in Price

WE have received quite a number of letters from our friends concerning the raise in the price of the Christian Herald from $1.50 to $2, which is to go into effect November 10, and we have been greatly pleased with their tenor. Without exception so far every reader who has written seems to be deeply appreciative of the condition which has been forced upon us. For instance, the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," "Jesus Is Here," and numerous other works of religious character, writes:

"September 22, 1916.

"The increased price of the Herald ought to be accepted cheerfully by the Herald Family, and I have no doubt it will be. The paper has been worth a great deal more than any subscription price put upon it. I find it invaluable for my library and for reference. With best wishes, CHARLES M. SHELDON."

Here is another one, equally cordial:

September 22, 1916.

You have taken us into your confidence, therefore we also can speak plainly.

Of course, raise the subscription price—but raise it on the old subscribers as well as or rather than on the new. We who belong to the Christian Herald will be glad to be asked for an additional mite—and fifty cents a year is only a penny a week increase. Why not add a dollar a year and give us a chance to show our appreciation of the weekly visitor that comes in like an old friend and has a message of hope and faith for all the family? MRS. ELLEN H. PALMER.

Pennsylvania.

Another member of the Christian Herald Family, who lives in New York State, went even farther. Instead of sending in a dollar and a half at the present time, she sent two dollars, to be applied on her renewal to begin in January. She writes, in part, as follows:

Editor, the Christian Herald:

I have been reading today in the Christian Herald that you must raise your price to $2 for the paper. My first thought was that I must take advantage of your $1.50 offer, as I am a great economist from necessity as well as from choice, but, after a few moments, it seemed to me unfair to you. . . . I think if it is a necessity for you to raise the price of your paper to $2, it is my business to pay the price. I am therefore renewing the subscription which expires in January.

EMILY WARE.

Here is a fourth letter in kind with the others:

Editor, the Christian Herald:

As to the increase in price of the Christian Herald, it is worth much more to any one than the present price, and has done ourselves and friends untold good. I don't think any Christian family should be without the Christian Herald.

Maryland. MRS. W. H. RIDDLE.

This is the cordial cooperation which we are meeting from our friends. Not one complaint! Not one letter have we received up to the present writing bemoaning the raise. Every one seems to understand that it is a situation which has been thrust upon us, one which, in all sincerity, we would meet without the help of our readers were we able to do so. But, as we have said before, the annual cost of the white paper which is used in the Christian Herald has been $200,000, and the increase, as it stands, for paper alone, will be far above $80,000. Then there has come the increase in the cost of labor, the increase in printing costs and in binding and mailing the publication. Of course, we are not the only ones. Other publications, in fact, every publication today in this country, seems to be in the same boat. A great many have already raised their prices, a great many more will do so later, and, sad to relate, a great many will be unable to publish at all. The Christian Herald means to go on as stanchly as ever. This it can do only with the help of its friends. But, thank God, the letters we have received indicate that our friends are with us in full cooperation.

Things Worth Striving For

A CHURCH, no matter where, prints on the back of its program of service these words:

"I will not worry.
"I will not be afraid.
"I will not give way to anger.
"I will not yield to envy, jealousy or hatred.
"I will be kind to every man, woman and child with whom I come in contact.
"I will be cheerful and hopeful.
"I will trust in God and bravely face the future."

Read them again.

They are words worth while.

Cut them out and paste or pin them where you will see them often.

About all there is in life worth striving for is suggested in these few lines.

Houses, lands, bonds, automobiles are fine possessions. But far more precious still to any man, in any station, are the treasures of the mind and soul—composure, courage, cheerfulness, tolerance, kindness, hope—all these and faith in something higher than what the eyes see and the hands hold.

CHARLES GRANT MILLER.

Our Sentinel in the Orient

THE great war is making big changes not only in world history but in national aims and opportunities. It is an era of universal change, and perhaps nowhere more than in the Orient. Anticipating the great interest of Americans in the transformation under way, the Christian Herald has sent Mr. Maynard Owen Williams, a brilliant young American writer, on a special mission to the Far East, there to study developments at first hand. Mr. Williams is an experienced traveler, who has already seen much of the world, and who served as a missionary for four years in the Orient. His letters, the first of which appears in the present issue, will be welcomed by our readers, who will learn from them what is actually going on on the other side of the globe at present in the way of national development on material and spiritual lines. He will write very frankly, setting down things as he finds them. We shall know from these letters whether Japan really wants war with us, and if so, the real reasons will be stated. He will tell of the progress of Christianity in the Mikado's kingdom, in the great republic of China, and in Korea. He will let us know how these countries stand affected toward our own, and what the United States can legitimately gain from the Orient. He will write of the vices that are being forced on these ancient peoples by civilized countries. He will have a good deal to say about the methods of evangelizing the East through Christian missions, and will treat it with the knowledge of one who has had experience and knows that, despite all drawbacks, nearly every great leader of public thought and action in China is either a Christian or was trained in a mission school.

Mr. Williams invites every reader of this journal, in spirit, to travel with him. He promises them abundant entertainment by the way. He is a sturdy Christian of the sunny type, whose company will never be found tedious. His letters will mingle the humorous with the serious, and will be good reading. We heartily commend them to our friends and trust that all will be the writer's fellow-travelers while the series runs. Thus they will have learned something that is really worth while from these pungent, good-humored, yet keenly observant epistles written in the "wonder lands of the world"—lands of temples and strange sights, of picturesque peoples, of shrines and idols, which represent the oldest continuous civilization in the world today.

Of one thing Mr. Williams assures us: that this trip is to be "a step in the process of ridding ourselves of the self-satisfied provincialism we love so well." He believes, and no doubt rightly, that we in America are too well satisfied; and he adds: "But across the Pacific are waking nations, striving for a higher destiny and progressing at a rate that might make us blush."

Religious Thought and the War

ONE of the miracles wrought by the war is the reawakening of the nations to the need of God. This is the thought that is dominant today throughout the civilized world. Begun without God and as the result of almost universal indifference to religion, the war has gone on from sacrifice to sacrifice, all human agencies proving utterly incapable of bringing it to an end.

Professor Buckham of Berkeley, Calif., describes the universal upset of the world's ideals in these vivid sentences:

"Down went our nineteenth century civilization, our flimsy progressivism, our half-hearted socialism, our sectarian churchianity, our utilitarian science, our crude culture. For the house of our civilization was built upon the sand, and we thought it was built upon a rock. Its walls were of paper, and we thought them marble. The thoughtful began to ask themselves, 'What does all this mean? Is it merely the tragic outcome of a universe without a soul? Or is this the pressure of a Hand upon us?'"

It is unquestionable that today all men are asking themselves what the meaning of this terrible visitation may be. But in these later months of the struggle, the real lesson of the war is beginn g t be understood. Those who think sanely, and hos hearts still cherish a reverent faith in the vin Sovereignty, are beginning to realize how erl antagonistic to every principle of his ben en government the life and thoughts of the nation av been in the years that have passed.

Gradually but surely the awakening has me The world is finding its way back to God; it is f lin faith, religion, friendship, kindness, humanity, ero and justice to be very real things—far more rea ha churches and cathedrals, creeds and dogmas. th glorious Gospel which Jesus gave to the world se at naught, or superseded by a gospel of Selfi nes and Might and Power and Greed, there must he day when these idols will be smashed, and the lar of the temple of falsehood will fall, crushing th als teachers themselves.

The whole history of the human race is a rec d o the struggle between the false and the true, fish ness and selflessness, justice and wrong, super tio and light. From every great crisis humanit ha risen purified and stronger, and with a cleare con ception of the purpose of man's existence. th present war, aside from all the sorrow and su rin into which it has plunged us, emancipates men fr th bondage of false doctrine and false views of God h sel it will have accomplished the miracle of miracl

And this is what it is obviously doing. M ar beginning to believe in and know God as eve before. All the teachings of the church did not erv to quicken the spiritual sense of the world, or t giv men a compelling vision of the greatness and go nes and indispensability of God, such as they n ar experiencing.

There is an old legend which says that the a ien idols of Egypt fell at the moment when esu was born, and that in heathen Rome the gilded i age in the temples of idolatry were broken to pie s a the very mention of his name. These are but le nds yet they carry a great lesson. We have seen nin abandoning her idols as the teaching of Christ nit progresses. So the great war, with its heavy de of loss and desolation, is drawing the multitude ron the worship of mammon and power and super tio and indulgence. They see in God the righteous dg and in Jesus the world's Redeemer. They fee hat without a definite purpose in the divine mi fo man, our existence here is like a leaf blown th wind, and the whole story of the race a tragic tra sty

It will be well for the church and its futur if i takes note of the great spiritual awakening. ha been wounded by the war, for it was not bla les and could hardly hope to escape. Its open adv acy of force, its neglect to inculcate the great les n o human brotherhood, its union with wealth and ver are all being brought home to it now in unmist able ways, that admonish it to return to the missi fo which it was created. It must return if it ould live and serve worthily. The new Christ ity which has its throes of rebirth in the war, i era tively demands the restoration by the chu o those eternal truths that have been obscure and neglected too long. It needs to go back to God ack to Christ and his teachings, back to Calvary a l its sacrifice, back to the immeasurable love that ave itself for the sins of man, back to reason and ght eousness.

This is the duty to which innumerable voic are calling the church today. The war may prove be the sound of the coming of His Kingdom on rth Is the church ready?

As to Politics and Advertisemen

AT the beginning of the present political ampaign, both of the two leading partie announced their intention to advertise heir claims to the support of the electorate. We ould conceive of no more impartial, unbiased, neutra way of presenting to our readers what the respective ties had to say to the people, than by accepting their vertisements. Space was offered to both parties o lentical terms; and both parties were invited with ual cordiality to address our readers in this manner

The Republican Party management has a iled itself of the opportunity in a former issue, and gain in this issue. The Democratic Party, so fa has declined the opportunity.

Having offered our advertising space and the offe having been accepted, we were morally and legally und to fulfil our offer and print the advertising matt

It is necessary, however, in order to preser the character of the Christian Herald as a non-p ical news weekly for the family, to make the sit ion clear. Hence this statement.

France Accepts Rodin's Gift

THE creation of a Rodin Museum in Paris was assured by the vote in the Chamber of Deputies, September 14, which accepted the offer of the collection of the works of Auguste Rodin, the sculptor. The vote was 370 to 56. The collection is valued by experts at more than 600,000. Last April Rodin the sculptor executed a deed of gift to the French government of his entire art collection, and the Hotel Birion in which they are housed. He retained a studio in the building. Auguste Rodin, the foremost of French sculptors, is 76 years old. In 1912 he offered to the state all his own works in his possession, the result of forty years of labor. For some reason the government did not accept the offer. Now the princely gift is accepted, and Paris adds to her already priceless art treasures. The Chamber of Deputies took little time from the consideration of the war chest, the levy of soldiers, and the terrible conflict, for the question of art, of beauty and spirit. It is the prayer of the universal heart of humanity that the parliaments of all the warring nations may soon turn to the consideration of the arts of peace, to the lessons of thrift, good will, fine education and the highest noble morals. With nations as with individuals, the beautiful, the intellectual and the spiritual are as necessary to life as are physical things. Christ thus announces the great truth: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God." (Luke 4:4.)

Stopping Work Killed Him

A BROKEN heart because he had no work to do was said to have been the cause of the death of John Agnew. He had served the city of Chicago for sixty-four years, and on August last at the age of eighty-four he was retired on a pension. Quite a time was made in the City Hall at the event of his retirement, a number of speeches being made, one by Mayor Thompson bearing tribute to the fidelity and constancy of his service. Tears came to the old man's eyes, and he told his son he was afraid he would die with nothing to do. He said he would rather have kept his old job and worked for nothing, than quit on the pension. He said a little later, "This idleness is killing me. I fear I shall never get used to it. What a blessing is work, work, work." His son attributes his death to the shock of quitting work. How many business and professional men drop out of life when they undertake to quit work and take things easy. Mr. Agnew was old enough to quit work and rest. The pension was a merciful provision for him. But his work and life had become so intertwined that taking the one also took away the other. How the idle among the rich and the poor are shamed by this old man's passion for toil, and how his industry ought to inspire the young and the old of our land to labor and constancy! Christ's passion for labor is thus expressed: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." (John 5:17.)

Reward for Old Papers

IN our civilized time paper is a commodity almost as necessary as meat. There is everywhere a shortage of paper, and one substance after another is pressed into service to meet it. Our government officially asked our people to be saving of the old papers that they might be ground over and made into new. The German government has offered medals to those saving the largest amount of old papers. Iron rings have been cast as medals for the purpose. In the competition it is said that the school children are at the forefront. The papers are cleansed and ground into pulp, from which a new product is derived. Economy is the word now. The utilization of forces heretofore waste in the industrial world means millions of saving. Christ, who was himself a child of poverty, and as the world Teacher knew the practical lessons of life, taught the most rigid economy when he said: "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (John 6:12.)

Transcontinental Automobile Record

THE record for the auto run from San Francisco to New York was lowered by fourteen hours and fifty-nine minutes, in a Hudson super-six car. The party left San Francisco Wednesday, September 13, at 12.01 A. M., and reached Columbus Circle, New York, at 6.31 the following Monday morning. The average for the 3,476 miles was 27 1/4 miles per hour. The drivers were A. H. Patterson of Stockton, Calif., who drove from San Francisco to Elks, Nev.; Ralph Mulford took the car from there to Laramie, Wyo., where Patterson picked up the car and took it to Omaha. Mulford made the run to South Bend, Ind., and C. H. Vincent drove the last lap of 910 miles into New York. A picture of the record-breaking car containing the drivers, Ralph Mulford, Charles Vincent, W. Sturm and L. Kalinsky, was taken in Columbus Circle, directly in front of the Columbus Monument, the terminal of the trip. The automobile is one of the miracles of our century. At the World's Fair at Chicago twenty-five years ago there was not a single automobile, nor a hint of one. Now the manufacture and use of it is simply marvelous. Men at first walked, then got on the back of an animal, an ox, a horse or a camel; then they got in a conveyance and had the animal haul it. No improvement on that method of land transportation was made for 6,000 years till about a century ago. The swiftest transportation in olden times was by horses and chariots. There is this record of an international tour by this mode of travel, when the Ethiopian drove in his chariot all the way to Jerusalem: "A man of Ethiopia. . . was returning, and sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet." (Acts 8:27, 28.)

Killed His Own Baby

A FARM hand aged twenty-three was put in prison the other day on the charge of murdering his girl baby, a year old. What did the father kill the child for? For crying. He came home drunk, so the press states, and the baby cried during the night. He struck the child hard a number of times, saying that it disturbed his sleep. But the baby kept on crying, and the father caught it by the neck and choked it to death. The mother remonstrated, and fought to save the child, and then ran to a neighbor's and telephoned the deputy sheriff, who came too late, as the child was dead. But he took the father to prison. The man admitted he had struck the baby and choked it, but did not intend to hurt it. Of course he did not. He was proud when the baby was born, and in his sober senses he loved the child, and would have laid down his life to defend it from harm. But drink made a maniac and murderer of him. The man was responsible for his insane conduct, the law recognizes that. The saloon which furnished the drink is a full partner in the crime, and the people who licensed the saloon are primarily responsible for the murder of the sweet little girl baby in the drunkard's home. The lawlessness and crimes of the saloon as much as anything else have provoked the revolt against it in this country and throughout the world. This curse is on society which permits it, as well as the liquor business: "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him, and makest him drunken also." (Hab. 2:15.)

Jefferson Davis's Birthplace

THE birthplace of Jefferson Davis at Fairview, near Hopkinsville, Ky., will be converted into a public park if plans laid at a meeting of Confederate veterans held there the other day are carried out. Control of the house in which the president of the Confederacy was born and nineteen acres to go with it was secured. Among those present at the meeting were General Bennett Young of Louisville, commander-in-chief of the United Confederate Veterans, and General Littlefield of Texas. Kentucky gave to the nation Lincoln and Davis, who led the North and the South in the struggle for the life of the republic. The Lincoln home has been accepted as a memorial by the government, and now the veterans of the Confederacy have secured the home of Davis for a memorial. The birthplaces of distinguished men throughout the world are cherished with pride. There is a birthplace to which the whole world looks for hope and life. "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem." (Matt. 2:1.)

To Curtail Sickness

PREVENTABLE diseases cause an annual loss of $880,000,000 to America's 30,000,000 workingmen, according to a statement just made by the Department of the Interior at Washington. To reduce this loss, the Bureau of Mines has launched a movement designed to improve the health of the workers. The bureau has been successful in materially reducing the loss of life in American mines, and it believes that a campaign among the workers on the surface of the earth will bring about better health conditions in the industrial plants of the country. The work is in charge of Surgeon J. A. Walkins, who prepared the statement that the average loss of time from sickness is nine days, which at one dollar a day for doctor's bills and two dollars a day for loss of time makes a total of $880,000,000 a year. The workman has a right to demand that he be not placed by the side of men who are diseased or mentally incompetent. The near billion of dollars lost by sickness, emphasized by the government bureau report, is the smallest part of the loss, which is in the suffering of disease and the cutting short of the precious lives of men and women, to whom life is so sweet and so full of temporal and eternal possibilities. More important than all is the health of the soul, which the Great Physician guarantees, and of whom it was said, "And he healed them who had need of healing." (Luke 9:11.)

World's Largest Stone Statue

ON the island of Ushigakubi in Japan there is a great stone ledge overlooking the sea. A company of eminent Japanese men has undertaken the project of having this carved into the figure of Nichiren, a Buddhist saint and founder of a large sect of that religion. Sculptors are now at work on this statue, which will be in a reclining position, 240 feet in length. The purpose of these promoters is moral and religious. Hawthorne tells the story of the Great Stone Face, which looked benignly down upon the young lad until he took on the qualities of unselfishness and humility which were written on its features. It is true that we become like the objects we look upon and worship; and it makes all the difference in the world whether our object be worthy of the full aspiration of a heart made in the image of God. Nichiren is an apostle of the hopelessness of the Buddhist religion, and the only message he has for the race is for man to meditate until he transcends the evils of a world of personal existence. A poor gospel when compared with the message of Christ given for sinful men. He, too, must be held up before the world's vision, that his life may be reproduced. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." (John 12:32.)

The Jungle Express

By
C. F. STODDARD

"These native gangs can lay a mile of rails a day"

IT is now possible to cross Africa by rail and water in practical comfort. Kings in Africa could always travel in comparative comfort, as our picture shows; but one not a king had difficulties to contend with which are being slowly removed by the steady extension of the means and methods of civilization. Following approximately the trails traversed by Livingstone and Stanley in penetrating the heart of that vast continent infested by wild animals and hostile natives, the traveler today may go from Banana at the mouth of the Kongo River on the west coast to Dar-es-Salaam on the Indian Ocean, a distance of 3,046 miles. Distances along the route are as follows: Banana to Matadi by river, 85 miles; Matadi to Leopoldville by rail around the rapids through the Crystal Mountains, 260 miles; Leopoldville to Stanleyville and the Stanley Falls by river, 1,000 miles; Stanleyville to Ponthierville around the falls by rail, 70 miles; Ponthierville to Kindu by river, 220 miles; Kindu to Kongolo around the Ukassa Falls by rail, 150 miles; Kongolo to Kabalo by river, 50 miles; Kabalo to Albertville on Lake Tanganyika by rail, 166 miles; by steamer across Lake Tanganyika to Kigomo, 95 miles; Kigomo to Dar-es-Salaam by rail, 950 miles. All but the last section, Kigomo to Dar-es-Salaam, is in Belgian Kongo, and the transcontinental trip may be made, with good connections, in forty days. The gauge of the railroads in Kongo is two feet five and one-half inches, and that of the German line three feet three and three-eighths inches. Lake Tanganyika is 2,642 feet above sea level. The final gap in this route, Kabalo to Albertville, was finished and opened to traffic in 1915, and the map of the route in the Kongo is a fair outline of a tropical helmet. The outbreak of the war has prevented the system from being put into actual operation. At last reports the English, Belgians and Portuguese, advancing from different directions, were driving the German colonial troops back upon the railway. Dar-es-Salaam is said to be in British hands.

The Cape-to-Cairo route is gradually nearing completion, the construction of only two sections in Kongo not yet having progressed beyond the survey. " . . . But By My Spirit"

By
L. D. STEARNS

MARY ELLEN was certainly trying; but then, according to Mary Ellen, so was Mary Ellen's mother; and on this particular morning each seemed to the other a little more trying than usual.

Mary Ellen was a roly-poly sort of a girl, with eyes as blue as the sky, and a great mass of tawny, curling hair which she tied low in the neck. A saucy mouth, a tip-tilted nose, and a tiny little patch of freckles on either cheek made up, at once, as captivating and as trying a bit of girlhood as one could well imagine. And, like too many a dainty bit of girlhood, Mary Ellen and her mother seemed daily to be growing farther and farther apart.

Mrs. Angus was tall and thin. Her brow was creased by innumerable lines. Her eyes were generally filled with a worried light.

"You'd think," Mary Ellen confided to a friend on a recent memorable occasion, "that Ma'd get tired of fretting. Why, if I feel good, she's worried 'bout what I'm planning to do; and if I'm sort of in the dumps, she's worried about what I've done!"

Now, however, Mary Ellen was feeling neither "good" nor "in the dumps." She was plainly and unmistakably in a temper.

Rising from the table she began to pick up the breakfast dishes with such energy that, as she thumped a couple of fragile cups on top of a pile of plates, there was a crash, and both cups lay in pieces.

The lines in her mother's face deepened. She took a resigned breath. "Well," said she, "if it's only cups, I suppose I needn't break my heart. What I'm fretting about's life. However you're going through that without breaking it, and yourself, too, is what scares me."

The blue eyes flashed. "I'm not asking any worrying," their owner declared sullenly. "My life's my own, I guess. But goodness knows 'tisn't worth much—never going anywhere, or having any good times!"

"But, Mary Ellen——"

"Everybody's going! If I can't, I'll—I'll—" Words were choked by sobs. Sitting suddenly down in a tempestuous heap, Mary Ellen began to cry. "Nobody'd ever dre-a-am I was sixtee-e-en!" she wailed.

SLOWLY her mother gathered up the dishes, and piling them on a tray carried them to the kitchen. As the door closed after the final load she gave vent to a long, troubled breath. "Seems," she declared slowly, "as if I hadn't taken a second's comfort or had a single easy day since that girl left off pinafores. She'll cry herself sick, now she's started, if she can't go. And she'll be all evening with Tom Winn if she does go! I wonder why girls can't have a little sense!" Then, turning, she reentered the dining-room. "Mary Ellen," she begged, "do be good. We'll go down street, soon's work's done up, if you'll just give up going, and get that pretty pink gingham you saw the other day."

But Mary Ellen sobbed on.

At the point of yielding, Mrs. Angus returned to the kitchen.

The gate clicked, and up the path came the new neighbor from across the way. Her face was as serene as the summer morning; her eyes clear and untroubled; her step springy and free. Mrs. Angus noticed that she was humming a little tune as she came up the walk.

She tapped at the open door; then entered. "I'm downright ashamed," she laughed, "to borrow. But my Eunice is head over heels in her pink muslin, and I do need an extra egg."

Mrs. Angus crossed to the pantry. "Don't you want two?" she asked.

Mrs. Winston shook her head. "No," she responded, "and I don't mean to borrow. But I did hate to ask the child to break into her work just to go to the store. She's trying to let down her dress. She thinks it's a little short."

"I suppose"—Mrs. Angus's tone was questioning—"she's going to the supper?"

"Oh, yes." Mrs. Winston glanced shrewdly at the worn, anxious face of the other woman. "I know," she said lightly, "that some of the youngsters carried things a little far last month. But I always go, you see. And Eunice has a notion I'm not much more than a girl, anyhow, so she always tells me things." She brushed an imaginary thread from her dress. "I'm afraid," she said gravely, "we wrap too much worry about our daughters, and not enough song."

"Wha-at?"

Her caller laughed. "We're neighbors," she declared earnestly. "We've broken bread together; we've knelt at the same communion table; and we've daughters of the same age, whom we are trying to steer clear of rocks into some safe harbor of life. I guess we'll be no worse, anyhow, for an hes exchange of thought, even if we' n better for it."

THE tense lines in the face the other did not relax. She sag l a little more wearily to one side "I don't know," sighed she, "how on an have daughters, and not worry! F my part, when I'm not worrying over nat Mary Ellen did yesterday or t ay, I'm dreading what she may d to-morrow. She's crying herself sick his minute, because I said she shoul not go to that supper tonight. I su ose I'll have to give in, or she'll go off, ext thing, into hysterics. She did, on or twice, when I held out too long. (d-ness knows I was scared! That' he way with Mary Ellen—away u or away down."

Into Mrs. Winston's eyes ca a far-away light. She glanced out rd, across the wide, sloping lawn, wi its scattering trees, its flowers, its l ad graveled walks. "It's a bea ful place," she announced slowly. "I wonder, sometimes, if any of us alf appreciate the beautiful things Go as given us—our possessions!" Her ice seemed meditative. "But it tak a lot of care, after we get them," saic ne, "to keep them beautiful." T n, briskly: "Hysterics are bad en gh in a girl, goodness knows. But a woman they're unbearable. Seem to me, Mrs. Angus, I'd get rid of t m, now, while she is a girl."

"But how—what—" The m er sat weakly down. "I'd do anyth ," said she limply, "rather than see er like that."

The other woman leaned forw d.

Into her eyes there came a sudden light; her face seemed unspeakably beautiful. "That's the way my mother felt," said she swiftly. "And it wasn't long before I found it out. And built on [illegible] for years it was a talisman that always brought my own way. At first I could control myself if I liked; but after a time anything out of the ordinary would throw me off. Then I married." A moment she covered her eyes. Tiny lines tensed about her mouth.

When she lowered her hand, her eyes seemed a little darker than usual. "I don't like to think about that time." She spoke slowly. "We sat down, one night, my man and I, and talked it out. And we decided to live apart." The last words were scarcely audible. Tales of shipwrecks, and reefs, and billows! Turning suddenly, she was silent.

In the big, airy kitchen was no sound except for the rustling of the leaves as the summer breeze moved them gently to and fro. Then sharply, into the silence came the sound of sobs from the next room. Mrs. Angus stirred uneasily.

"When I went upstairs to pack," continued the other, "I thought life was over. You see, I loved my man! And as I set to the task, suddenly and distinct from somewhere in the room, seemed to come the words: 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.' I can't tell, to this day, whether I really heard them, or thought them, or felt them; but I do know there was a presence there I had never felt before. I wasn't religious. I'd never thought much about God. But I dropped the dress I was holding, and knelt down and talked with—God!"

She was facing Mrs. Angus now. The little tense lines had faded. The clear, free glow had returned to her eyes. "When my man came home," she continued simply, "we had another talk, and we decided to keep on together. There's an illuminated text in my room, framed and hung where my eyes fall upon it the first thing every morning. And with it, also, written in my heart, 'I've conquered.' When Eunice came, she started out in the same old way. But I determined my little girl should not suffer as her mother had done. So, because of the message in my heart, I sang instead of cried; smiled instead of frowned; loved instead of worried; and, controlling my own self, taught her to do the same. Today," she smiled, "my little girl has learned that lack of self-control is weakness; that only those things that are sweet and clean, and can bear the test of open soul-windows and light, make for happiness."

Rising, she held out her hand: "Don't forget to sing," she warned. "Somehow, it keeps things sweet." The next moment, she was hurrying down the walk.

"But by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

MRS. ANGUS stood by the sink, gazing absently at the dishes. Her thoughts were far away; back, back they raced, until, at the old red schoolhouse, they found a girl hunting for four-leaf clover, to the tune of a lilting song. Just as she found one her chum came down the street. "Nell," cried she, "I've chosen my life-text. It's 'Casting all your care on Him, for He careth for you.' What's yours? You know Mr. Ellis said he wished we girls who were to join the church on Sunday would choose a life-text."

Smoothing the four-leaf clover in the palm of her left hand the other girl had answered, "'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.'"

What an eternity ago it seemed! Her life-text! Putting up one hand, Mrs. Angus wiped away a tear. But the tense lines about her mouth disappeared. After all, girls weren't such intricate problems when one happened to go back into one's own life, and remember.

Gathering up the dishes, she piled them into the roomy pan. On her lips were the long-forgotten words of a hymn; in her eyes a smile.

WHEN the last dish was stacked up, and the table wiped clean, she opened the door and reentered the dining-room. Crossing swiftly to Mary Ellen, she laid a gentle hand on the quivering curls. "Lassie," said she, "when a girl's too weak to control herself she's sick, I'm thinking, and needs to go to bed. If that's the case with you, mother'll help you undress, and even get the doctor, if necessary. But otherwise, dry your eyes and run out and wash the dishes. Which'll it be?" There was something new in the voice; something, that, while it was very sweet and kind, was also very sure and strong. And there was no hint, even, either of yielding or of fear.

Slowly Mary Ellen wiped her eyes. Missing the supper was bad enough, without spending the day in bed!

As she rose hesitatingly to her feet, she found herself close to her mother's heart. "Little girl," a very tender voice was saying, "I've been thinking about the time when I was a girl. They're all alike—the girls that were, that are, and that will be. They all hunt four-leaf clovers—do wrong and right—and love the sun. And—will you let mother come into the sun with you? She'll try to do her part, if you'll try to do yours."

A moment, there was silence.

"Not by might, nor by power!"

The mother's heart was beating in strange, slow throbs that seemed to shake the very center of her being; and then about her neck were two soft arms; an adorable red mouth was clinging to hers; and a voice from which the last trace of temper had fled was confessing, "Seems, at times, mother, just's if I couldn't be good. And when you worry——"

"I'm through." Mrs. Angus' tone left no room for doubt. "I've found something better to do." The weight of years appeared to have slipped from her. "You and I've got to enjoy our possessions, dearie; and now"—her voice slipping back into wise matter-of-fact—"if you'll do those dishes, I'll make a cake. To-morrow's my birthday, and I'm thinking I'd like to get acquainted with some of your young people. Supposing we have a little supper, and you do the inviting. It won't be much work, and I'd sort of enjoy it. Wouldn't you?"

The blue eyes began to dance. Then they clouded. "Can I ask Tom Winn?" she hazarded.

"Why not?" Still that matter-of-fact tone! "Home's home—mother's mother—and girls are girls. I guess most of the boys and girls are all right. Anyhow, it won't hurt any of them to come here, I guess. And maybe we might as well take in that supper to-night, after all. I'd like to see if they're really as good as you young people think. Your white muslin's all right, and my lavender'll pass, won't it?"

"Mother! oh, mother!" There was a quick swishing of dainty frillings—a quick, soft whisper-cry, "I'll be good! I will be good!"—a quick opening and closing of a door—and the mother was alone.

A MOMENT she stood looking smilingly, but with wet eyes, across the velvety lawn. "Four-leaf clovers, and—a life-text!" The words came with a tender, almost reverent sound. Then she moved leisurely toward the kitchen door, and a second later, from the pantry, came the words of a familiar hymn. At the second line a fresh young voice joined softly in the tune.

CASTLES IN THE AIR. According to correspondents of the Boston Transcript in Rome and Vienna, the October issue of "Das Neue Europa," the official publication of the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Office, will contain an inspired article proposing that the territory in the Trentino which Italy is now attempting to redeem from Austrian rule should be ceded to the Church of Rome, and be created a papal state in which the pope should be guaranteed a permanent temporal sovereignty. Vatican circles are said to desire a return to temporal power, but to feel that the place for such power to be exerted is from Rome rather than from the Trentino. It is suggested that the Trentino plan is a feeler put out by the Vatican.

ALEXANDER the GREAT Ordered Shaving to Ensure VICTORY

ADOLPH TREIDLER

SHORTLY before marching against Darius, Alexander the Great chanced to see a fragment from a Babylonian bas-relief, depicting a victor holding an enemy by the beard while he put him to the sword. Immediately the great general ordered his soldiers to shave off their beards.

The difficulty of shaving, during the succeeding campaigns, caused much grumbling and at times threatened revolts.

In the world-war today clean shaving is ordered in practically all armies—for sanitary reasons and to expedite dressing of subsequent wounds, but largely on account of the bracing effect on the men.

On all fronts the man with a Gillette Safety Razor is said to be the most popular man in his squad. In almost every company from a dozen to fifty Gillettes are owned and loaned about.

The Gillette shave is quick and cool, safe and sanitary. It is velvet-smooth, no matter how wiry the beard or tender the skin. Adjust the handle for a light or a close shave. A keen, fresh blade is always ready. No stropping—no honing. Prices $5 to $50. Blades 50c. and $1 the packet. Dealers everywhere.

Uncle Sam's Best Investment

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

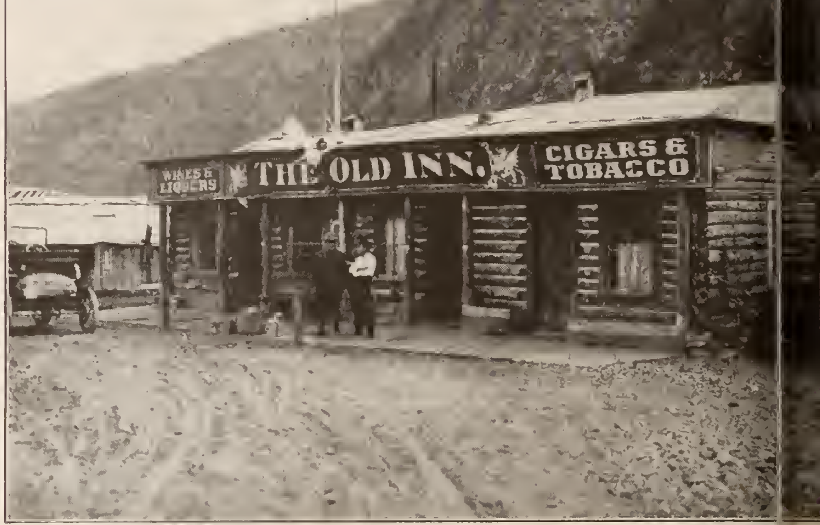
FEW people realize the great extent and possibility of our Alaskan trade. The commerce of this territory last year was more than $70,000,000. It exceeded our total commerce with China by more than $5,000,000 and was one-fifth as large as our total trade with all South America. The great part of this was exports: but the imports amounted to over twenty-two millions, and in proportion to the white population it was greater than that of any other country of the world. The per capita commerce was about $1,800, with a balance of trade in favor of each white man of over $500. Including the Indians and Eskimos, the per capita commerce was $910, while that of Great Britain was only $133. This means that the trade of Alaska was, on the average, for every man, woman and child, more than six times as great as, that for every man, woman and child in Great Britain.



One is not left in much doubt as to the commodities to be bought her

If this is so when the land is a wild waste so covered with moss and other vegetation that not one acre in a hundred of it has yet been prospected, and when not one acre in a thousand has yet been brought into cultivation, what may we not expect of the country with the railroad and other developments of the future?

Indeed, Alaska is one of the best business propositions under Uncle Sam's flag. Considering the amount of money invested and the hands employed, we have nothing that produces such vast returns. ·The country has now less than seventy thousand people, and of these perhaps forty thousand are whites. This includes men, women and children, so that the working force is comparatively small. Nevertheless, the product in 1914 sold for $41,000,000, of which more than eighteen millions came out of the mines and more than twenty-two millions from fisheries and furs. During that year, the gold yield was almost sixteen million dollars, while that of California, whose population is thirty-seven times as great, was only a little over twenty-one millions. The value of the Alaska fishery products was more than twenty-one millions, while that of the state of Washington brought in over eight millions. The copper output in 1914 was less than three millions, but that was enormously increased last year and will be doubled and trebled in the years to come.

As to the whole territory, by and large, it has paid us better than any investment the nation has made. It cost us less than two cents an acre, and, spreading our receipts over the whole area, we have already netted more than a dollar and a half an acre, and that notwithstanding we have scratched the surface of but few of its 590,000 square miles. The furs from the land nima have already paid the price of e ter tory, and those from the seals ve so for nine times as much. As to e fis eries, they have yielded more th thir

OODS have to be carefully packed and put up in special ways for the kan trade. They must be so treated they will stand the changes of ite, the heat of the summer and the of the winter. Perishable provi- are coated with gelatin. Take s, for instance. They must be so ected that they will not be ruined st in the snow or dropped into a . was interested in the furniture and lware. The company keeps wag- and sleds, and some of the latter carry ten tons at a load. It has dog sleds to be used for the traffic inter, and with them dog harness tugs, collars and back straps. The nary dog sled costs $10. Another le of merchandise is dog feed, a t deal of which is ordinary tallow. dogs on the trail are fed once a and that at nightfall. Their usual is fish and rice cooked together tallow. This firm will sell about a lred thousand pounds of tallow winter.

is establishment runs a steam- ing plant which warms the business of Fairbanks. It has a central on, with the pipes running from it ugh the chief buildings of the ness section, including the most of e within eight or ten blocks. The t furnishes heat to its customers o much per month throughout the . It keeps the stores and houses n when the thermometer goes down 0 or 70 degrees below zero. The s run side by side with the r pipes, so that the latter are k from freezing in the heart of the er.

n interesting thing in connection the steam-heating plant is that urns wood only. It takes 10,000 ls to keep the plant going during the season, and today there is a wood pile on the edge of the town large enough for next winter's demand. I went out to see it. The wood is cut in cord wood lengths and piled up to a height of eight feet. The pile covers twelve acres. I walked around it and it was almost a Sabbath day's journey. I climbed up on top and had a photograph made to show the length of the wood and its character. That wood all cost over $8 a cord, and the pile is worth more than $80,000. This wood is spruce, and it is cut from government land within five miles of Fairbanks. The government charges the wood cutters a stumpage of 25 cents a cord.

The Northern Commercial Company is denounced as a monopoly by some of the smaller merchants of Alaska. There is probably considerable truth in the statement; but any one can import goods, and there are several firms here that are doing a very large business for this part of the world. One is E. R. Peoples, Incorporated, and another is the Dominion Commercial Company, both of which have their headquarters at Fairbanks and do business with the mining camps for a hundred miles or so in the neighborhood. They also send goods by small steamers far up the tributaries of the Yukon.

Another trading station is Wiseman, about ninety miles from Bettles, on the Koyukuk, but the stream is so shallow that the goods are hauled there on barges drawn by horses. The freight rate is $1.40 a ton, and the goods are much higher in consequence. Flour sells at Wiseman for $36 a barrel, and bacon brings 75 cents a pound. The most of the merchandise is paid for in gold dust. A miner will come in and pay for his purchases out of his poke of gold dust, the storekeeper weighing out the amount needed. There are now something like 250 miners in the Koyukuk region, and their trade is worth a thousand dollars per man. The miners will often come in at the close of a season and drink up all they have made within a few days. A miner will put his poke of gold on the bar of a saloon and ask all to drink with him. It is an insult not to join in, whether you know him or not. The man keeps up his spree until his money is gone and then, like as not, gets credit for a new supply of goods for the camp.

The Church and the World War

MANY times since the beginning of the great European War, the assertion has been made that the reak of such a tremendous conflict ng Christian nations was proof that istianity was a failure. This claim been so repeatedly and insistently ed that it has attracted universal ntion. It has been made the subject liscussion in the pulpit and in the s, and several books have appeared ling with the question, "Has Christ ity failed?"

ne of the foremost of American ers and thinkers, Washington Gladd, has taken up the task of discussing great problem in a volume just is- l through the Macmillan publishing se, entitled "The Forks of the d," in which he aims to tell the un- nished truth concerning the rela- ship of the church to the war. It book so enlightening, so packed with rous thought, and so wholly un- sed and fair on all points, that it erves to be in the hands of every der of the Christian Herald.

e are privileged, by the permission he publishers, to give some of the e notable passages of the book w.

THE outbreak of the present war was greeted by a chorus of excla- tions over the failure of Christianity. t such an eruption of violence should ur in the midst of a civilization ming to be Christian seemed to ookers in the neutral nations some- ng unnatural and shocking."

The moral sense of mankind—or at some of us would like to recognize the moral sense of mankind, in its highest expression—appears to have reached a phase of development at which it regards the coexistence of Christianity and war as a grotesque anomaly. The two institutions would seem to be mutually exclusive. Yet here is war, on the most stupendous scale known to history, spreading itself over a large part of the civilized world, and the Christian churches in all the countries immediately affected are not only offering no effectual resistance to it, but are giving to it, in sermons and prayers and the consenting voices of great congregations, their heartiest approval and support. I think that 'the moral sense of most' has a right to be shocked and scandalized by this state of things and to call for an explanation."

"Professor Jacks of Oxford University (editor of the Hibbert Journal) ventures one explanation: 'The cause of the present war is quite simple; some nation or nations wanted to fight. And I venture to think that so long as any powerful nation wants to fight, no human arrangement, no scheme of federation or international peace, will prevent it from fighting.'

"But this is too simple. The wanting to fight must be explained. There was a tremendous accumulation, somewhere, of inclination to fight—an inclination that had been fed and nourished for long periods. Besides this there were, in all these nations, vast preparations for war, billions of dollars' worth of arms and implements of war in readiness for use, millions of men who had been trained in the arts of war. What needs to be accounted for is this aggregation of murderous hate and

John W. Bate's Last Word in Efficiency

The Mitchell Sedan—Springfield Type—in Fair Weather

Luxury Models For Next Year's Shows

Including Three Year-Round Types

At next year's Shows—which start in January—the Mitchell will exhibit some extra-fine luxury bodies.

Our artists and experts have been working for months on them. About all the fine cars in the world have been studied, to get every appealing touch.

John W. Bate, the great efficiency expert, has directed all these efforts. So each of these Mitchells has dozens of features which no other one car has.

We have built 500 of these models, some enclosed and some convertible. And we want to get them this winter into the hands of the right 500 people.

Only 500—No More This Year

We have built only 500, and that for two reasons. One is that this winter we want them exclusive. They are really advertisements of the Mitchell class; and we want those who get them to prize them.

Then the over-demand for our open cars made a larger output impossible, anyway.

If you want an extra fine car—either a winter car or an all-season car—we urge you to see these new models at once. Your Mitchell dealer can supply them while they last.

Latest All-Weather Cars

See in particular the all-weather models. They lead in popularity.

One is the Mitchell Sedan—a Springfield type. A closed car with the luxuries of a Limousine. But the plate glass sides disappear in a moment, and you have an open Touring Car.

The Mitchell Cabriolet is a 3-passenger Coupe hich changes in a moment to an open Roadster.

The Mitchell demountable top makes a Touring Car a closed car when you want it.

The Mitchell Limousine and Mitchell Coupe will give you a new conception of closed car luxury.

You get in any Mitchell model at least 20 per cent. extra value. That is due to our factory efficiency. John W. Bate, in this model plant, has cut our factory costs in two.

Even in the Mitchell open cars you get 26 extra features which other cars omit. You get 440 parts made of toughened steel. You get many parts—vital parts—made of Chrome-Vanadium steel.

You get a car which is built to be—and proved to be—practically a lifetime car.

In these luxury bodies you will see many more extras. You who get them will have cars which no one else can match. See your Mitchell dealer now.

“Strict Accountability” as applied to the President

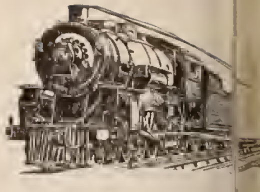
By FRANCIS BELLAMY



A LOCOMOTIVE engineer has got to have a clear record of good judgment to hold his job.

If an accident is due to his incorrect judgment, if in an emergency his mind has wobbled and he has done the wrong thing, his good intentions don't save him. Too much is at stake in the engineer's business for the public to accept any excuses whatever. Capacity for quick, right action in emergencies is the engineer's first qualification. If he falls down in one emergency, another engineer, whose record is clear, takes his place.

Soft Excuses

THAT illustration was suggested by a remark made by a citizen in a political talk. Some of the glaring blunders, vacillations, and inefficiencies of the Wilson administration had been pointed out. This citizen was obliged to admit these undisputed facts, but he side-stepped them, saying: “Well, everybody makes mistakes, and you must remember what a trying time Mr. Wilson has had.”

That easy-going excuse is now the last word of many a Wilson supporter when he has been made to face, one by one, the sheer facts of the President's wrong-headed and turn-about record.

In the simpler days of our fathers we held public servants to strict account for their errors of judgment.

But in our days of softer living, a sentimentalism has soaked into much of our political thinking.

While in business we hold men to strict account because that is bread and butter, in politics, unhappily for our country, there are now a great many of these soft minds whose sympathy and weak standards lead them to excuse flagrant errors of judgment.

The Test of Big Emergencies

THE engineer who is entrusted with the welfare of a hundred millions of people has to qualify for extraordinary emergencies.

It happens to have been Mr. Wilson's fortune to engineer the country's honor and safety in a time of crisis. He must therefore be judged, fairly, by his capacity in time of trouble.

Not merely for the trouble already encountered, but for the trouble still to come. For not one of the great issues he has mishandled is ended. Their most critical developments are yet to be settled.

The first relates to Mexico. The second to Germany. The third to military preparedness. The fourth to industrial preparedness.

These issues are the protection of our citizens, the upholding of our honor, the preparation for our safety, the securing of our prosperity.

In not one of these issues has Mr. Wilson had a settled policy. In each one he has had several absolutely contradictory policies.

Nobody knows what his next policies will be.

If he knew what they would be, he would have told us definitely, instead of using high sounding, but indefinite, uncertain phrases.

The Test of Mexico

THE facts as to Mexico are undisputed. They are confirmed by Mr. Wilson's own messages and by the published papers of his State Department.

Huerta became the de facto head of Mexico just before Mr. Wilson's inauguration. Huerta was ready to give guarantees for Mexican obligations to the United States and assurances for the protection of our citizens. That is the only kind of ground on which our Government can give or refuse recognition of another government.

But Mr. Wilson swept aside the universal rule and refused recognition of Huerta because he suspected him of complicity in the death of Madero. He put a personal theory above the invariable international rule.

He has told Congress that we must not “butt in” on Mexico. But his personal attack on Huerta was the beginning of nearly four years of systematic “butting in.”

He refused to accept the information of our own Ambassador, and sent to Mexico inexperienced personal emissaries who did not even know the language.

He destroyed American prestige in Mexico, and angered all classes of Mexicans by his unjustifiable intrusions, by his uninvited lectures.

He told Huerta he must get out. He told the Mexicans that they must not elect him to the presidency.

He made war on Mexico, attacking Vera Cruz, with the result that 18 American sailors and 200 Mexicans were killed, to get a salute to the flag. He did not get it and he withdrew our army in failure.

Then he pitted Carranza and Villa against Huerta. He lifted the embargo on arms, and hundreds of thousands of American guns and millions of bullets poured over the border, till Mexico became a vast slaughter house.

When Carranza became insolent, Mr. Wilson took up Villa, the champion bandit and murderer of the continent.

Then he suddenly dropped Villa, and encouraged Carranza, permitting him to march his army across our own territory to attack Villa.

When Villa attacked an American town, Mr. Wilson sent an army 300 miles into Mexico to “get Villa alive or dead,” but the army was handicapped by an order forbidding it to use a railroad or enter a Mexican town.

When all Mexico resented this second war on her territory, he ordered the army to come back, without getting Villa.

In spite of the certainty that his policy would lead to collision with Mexico, Mr. Wilson did absolutely nothing for three years to increase the efficiency of our little regular army; and when we got on the brink of war he had to order out our National Guard, taking 50,000 men from their homes and business, at an untold cost of suffering to dependent families, for a service for which they were utterly unprepared, and which was entirely unnecessary if, as President, he had exercised commonsense foresight.

Mr. Wilson found a strong government in Mexico, with American lives and property safe there. Because of his culpable intrusion that government was upset, Mexico was forced into anarchy, thousands of Americans residing there have been driven out and their business utterly destroyed, hundreds of Americans have been murdered, and nearly as many American soldiers have been killed in our two invasions there as were killed in our Spanish War.

That vast incapacity in dealing with Mexico is more than enough, by itself, to disqualify Mr. Wilson for re-election.

The Test of Germany

MR. WILSON has not “kept us out of war” with Germany, any more than he “kept us out of war” with Mexico. But with this difference. He did get us into war with Mexico. He couldn't have got us into war with Germany if he had tried. For Germany was too busy; she had no inclination to go to war with us; and, moreover, she couldn't get at us.

But what Mr. Wilson did as to Germany was to sacrifice our national honor, and to fail to get either protection or reparation for American lives.

In February, 1915, the German Government announced its submarine programme of sinking merchant ships without warning.

Thereupon, Mr. Wilson, voicing the horror of America, wrote a note to Germany, declaring that, if Americans were killed, Germany would be held to “strict accountability.” We were proud of his brave words.

But two days before the Lusitania sailed, Von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, published a notice in the New York papers warning Americans not to embark on that ship.

That was a gross insolence—a foreign government addressing Americans in their own country and directly ignoring the President's recent declaration that Americans had the right to sail as they pleased.

Never but once before had a foreign envoy dared to advise the American people. That was a French minister in President Washington's time, and Washington sent him home with a sharp rebuke.

When the German Ambassador printed his insulting advertisement, the natural, regular course for our President should have been to give him quick notice that if American lives were lost, as per his warning, he would receive his passports.

The historic method of all our great Presidents has been to avert a national catastrophe before it happened. Jackson did that to France, Cleveland did that to England, Roosevelt did that to Germany—and each thereby prevented war and maintained our rights.

But Mr. Wilson let that golden opportunity slip and took the insult without a word.

In speaking of that incident, Mr. Hughes said:

“The chief function of diplomacy is prevention. Had this Government, by the use of both informal and formal means, left no doubt that when we said ‘strict accountability’ we meant precisely what we said, and that we should unhesitatingly vindicate that position, there would have been no destruction of American lives by the sinking of the Lusitania. There we had ample notice; in fact, a published notice.”

But having let his one great chance slip, Mr. Wilson followed his doubled-fist note of “strict accountability” with a diminuendo series of Please-Be-Good lectures to the German Government,—with the result that more American lives were lost, and now, after a year and a half, no reparation has been made.

The truth was, the astute German Government had taken Mr. Wilson's measure,—the measure of Bryan, his Secretary of State, and the measure of Congress. With such an aggregation it was safe to take chances which would have been unsafe with Roosevelt, or McKinley, or Cleveland. For no nation on earth has greater respect for a strong national stand than has Germany.

Would it have meant war to call the turn that day on Von Bernstorff? Mr. Hughes says, again:

“It is a great mistake to say that resoluteness in protecting American rights would have led to war. Not only have we a host of resources short of war to enforce our just demands, but we shall never promote our peace by being stronger in words than in deeds.”

History will record that when that sudden emergency came, President Wilson failed to rise to it. He will be pitied, but not excused.

That is not all. For his pedantic lectures have exasperated the Germans and lost their friendship. The aftermath is yet to come. The President who failed in the emergency is not the engineer for the final reckoning.

The Test of Military Preparedness

NEXT, review Mr. Wilson's several contradictory attitudes, as to Military Preparedness. Here are the bare facts:

In the Fall of 1914 the Mexican trouble had become so acute that our armed intervention might be required at any hour. The war in Europe was proving that the principles of humanity were powerless to keep civilized nations out of war, that altogether unprecedented methods of warfare had made former methods of preparedness obsolete, and our turn might come next.

Congressman Gardner pointed all this out, and asked for an investigation of our preparedness.

Mr. Wilson answered that it might be an interesting academic inquiry, but quite unnecessary.

(This is a paid advertisement.)

iter he said in a speech that there was no reason :ever to get nervous or excited over preparedness. few days after the submarine sank the Lusitania, Wilson made a speech in which he specifically ored the application of patriotism to preparedness, made the notorious remark about being "too d to fight." This took all the edge off his "strict untability" note to Germany; the German press mented on it and the nan Government acted rdingly.

gain and again in his ic utterances in 1915. Wilson opposed the ing agitation for predness.

ut the influence of Col. sevelt in his popular paign for preparedness e Mr. Wilson "stop listen." Suddenly he a great light.

hen he abruptly faced other way.

n December 18, 1915, nade an amazing speech ew York in favor of predness. He followed this tour of speech-making ne Middle West, advoca- a scheme of big military nsion.

ut when he got back to shington he saw still ther light. He found the nocratic majority in Cons opposed to his new trine. He had already ed a reluctant Congress do several unpalatable igs, but this time his d weakened.

fter all his talk he surdered his big scheme; his Secretary of War reied in disgust at his capation.

here, in twelve months, e three contradictory cies. The wrongness of first was proved by the ut-face of the second. insincerity of the second proved by the piffling ffectiveness of the third. Have we ever had a sident before who could erse himself both forrds and backwards on h a tremendous issue in space of a year?

This is how Mr. Hughes sums up that wobbling icy:

'In view of the warnings of the past three years it inexcusable that we should now find ourselves in h a plight."

The country was awake and was ringing with the nand for an efficient army. Mr. Wilson had his nce to engineer it. Instead, he caught on at the l of the train. He has shown himself utterly incaple to handle our national defense. We need a Present who can.

The Test of Industrial Preparedness

WHEN Mr. Wilson went into the presidency he demanded repudiation of our tariff for protection and a new tariff for revenue only. As a college professor of political economy he had en an ardent free trader.

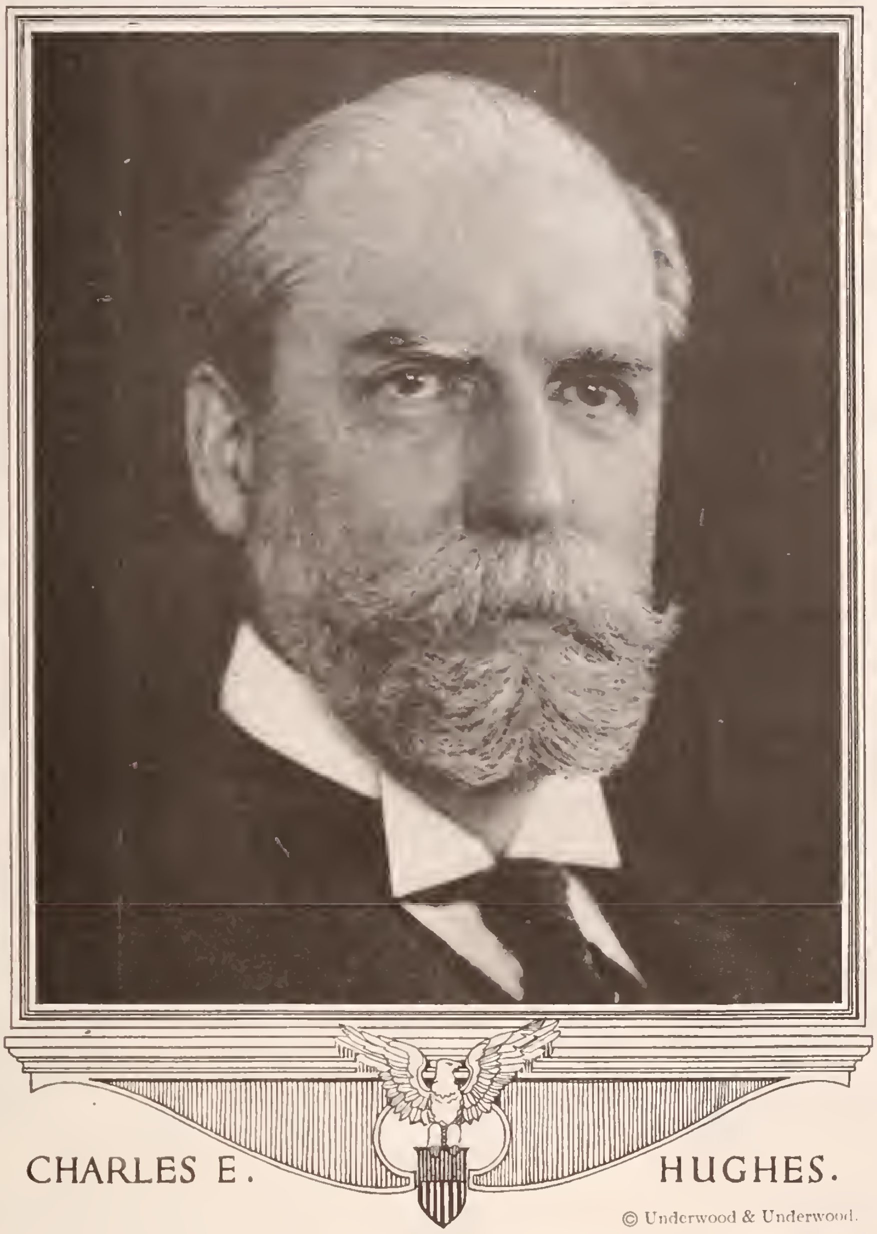
Now that he had the chance to put his college eories into practice, he refused to believe that a v tariff, for revenue only, would bring a deluge of ıropean cheap-labor products, close our factories, d throw our workmen out of employment.

He drove the Underwood low tariff through.

In less than a year, its baleful effects had ttled down. In 1914 thousands of factories had en obliged to close down. Millions of men were t of work. In New York City alone 450,000 en were unemployed. It was a high-water mark of rkless men.

Here are the Government's own figures: During the st five months of 1913, while still under the Repubcan Tariff, our exports exceeded our imports by $218,-.8,200. But during the corresponding five months 1914, under the Democratic Tariff, our imports exceeded our exports by $39,154,586. The whole balance in our favor had been wiped out, and a huge balance created against us.

Then came the European War, and the frenzied call for munitions and other supplies for the armies. Ten millions of fighting men needed everything we could make for them, and their governments were ready to pay any price.



CHARLES E. HUGHES.

© Underwood & Underwood.

Every plant that could make anything for the fighting nations turned itself into a supply factory. Never in American history had such a stream of gold crossed the ocean to us.

And now Mr. Wilson points to this fevered plenty and says, "This is the PROSPERITY I predicted. My policy has made America opulent."

But Mr. Hughes, on the other hand, points out that as soon as the war is over we will have new and difficult problems to face. Thousands of our factories are making products for which there will suddenly be no demand. These factories will close. More men than ever will be out of work, while the higher cost of living will remain a crushing burden.

If Mr. Wilson's low tariff remains Europe will engulf our unprotected industries.

In an industrial crisis like that, do we want a President elected on the written platform that the Constitution does not permit any tariff except for revenue?

Do we want a President who told the unemployed workmen and their employers in 1914 that the hard times were only "psychological"?

Surely not!

We NEED for our President a practical man who knows the language of business;

Who comprehends the problems of the manufacturer;

Who senses the needs of transportation;

Who is on the square in labor disputes, and will neither knuckle to the capitalist nor sacrifice justice to get the labor vote;

Who figures for the country's lasting prosperity.

We can have such a President in Mr. Hughes.

All his life he has dealt with business at first hand.

In his gigantic investigation of Life Insurance, and in the regulating laws he put through when Governor, he showed his ability to straighten out big business without hurting it.

In the labor legislation he put through in New York, he secured more measures for the benefit of workingmen than any other American executive.

murderous machinery. This is not a mere impulse or sentiment, it is a product. It is an effect; what is the cause?

"The universal belief of all the nations that all the other nations are actual or probable enemies is the procuring cause of the armaments by which war is made, and of the wars in which the armaments logically issue."

"The outstanding fact is that there has been no clear and coherent teaching respecting the foundations of the social order by the Christian Church; the Law of Love has been preached, but for the most part it has been regarded as having a partial and rather esoteric application to human relations; it was not supposed to be a practical rule in trade or business of any sort; it could not be followed in politics; it was a counsel of perfection, rather than a rule of conduct."

"Human beings are made to live together upon this planet and to find in mutual cooperation a large part of the good of being. The law of life is therefore love or good-will. They are sharers in one another's welfare; each one is largely dependent for his happiness on the well-being and well-doing of his fellows."

"We have even been hoping for a world commonwealth in which we might all be fellow citizens. . . . There are signs that the old individualism, which so long dominated human thought and ruled the current theology, is yielding to a larger view, in which the individual, instead of discriminating his interest from that of the community and seeking first his own salvation, shall identify himself with the community, and seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, finding himself, and securing his own welfare, not by struggle against his fellows, but by cooperation with them. This, undeniably, is the heart of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; and if the Christian Church had been loyal to it in its simplicity, strife and warfare would have disappeared from the earth long ago."

"Of all the kingdoms of Anti-christ, however, the most powerful is the realm of international relationships. Here the principle of good-will has found but scant recognition. . . . Good-will may be permitted to play some subordinate part in national intercourse, but the fundamental assumption of every nation is that every other nation is a probable enemy. Every armament is the advertisement—the proclamation by the nation—of its lack of faith in the existence of good-will on the part of its neighbors; of its unwillingness to trust in the law of love as the basis of national relationships. Every fort, every battleship, every regular army regiment, every militia organization, is a confession of the national faith in force rather than in good-will.

"If it is not a declaration of its own purpose to invade and overpower weaker peoples, it is an accusation against other nations—a confession of its suspicion that some or all of them are likely to invade and plunder it, unless it is armed against them.

"Such is the state of mind in which we find the leading nations of the earth, the nations which call themselves Christian. It is a state of mind with which all intelligent Christians should make themselves familiar, and should endeavor to understand and explain. This state of mind is the one important fact with which the world, at this crisis, has to deal. It is the spirit of militarism which is now before the world's judgment seat, and the Christian Church is deeply concerned in this inquiry, because the spirit of militarism has entered into and taken possession of what we call Christian civilization. For the health and sanity of the ideas which control Christian civilization, the Christian Church is responsible."

"Those who are inciting this work of preparation for war must needs be cultivating in the minds of the people such fears and suspicions toward some nation or other as alone could w so heavy a drain upon its revenue course, under such conditions, th tion of this nation toward the nations of whom it entertains suspicions must be more and strained. No nation can thus s another without the other know and resenting it. Between n thus regarding each other, an oc for war will easily be found.

"This is the psychology of wa originates in a state of mind. A state of mind in which it origin the antithesis of the Christian st mind."

"It may be said that the Ch churches could not have stoppe movement if they had tried. I do not believe. There are said seven hundred thousand Christian ters in Europe and America. If th set themselves with a reasonable de unanimity against the war propa basing their opposition on the prin of Christ's Gospel, their protest woul been heeded. But we shall never whether the protest would have successful or not, because it wa made with any force. And it o have been made."

"The men who assemble to ma adjustments which will be requi the close of the war will have to fa fact that the law of cause and effe no more be evaded by nations th individuals. Looking backward must see that in founding all policy as nations on the princi egoistic nationalism, they have da and defiantly trampled under fo law by which God has made men together."

"The assumption of continuou and of war as the ultimate and onl arbitrament of national differen the assumption on which all in tional relations have rested hit The common notion seems to b that assumption will rule the thi of the members of that conferenc it does do so, the future of our r very dark. If humanity has le nothing in this dies iræ, one wo what will ever make it wise. I c that I am unable to entertain s benumbing conception."

"The only other assumption to this congress can possibly come assumption that peace among th tions is the only conceivable national policy, and that the business of that august assembl to prepare the way of peace and t the peoples into it."

"The nations are at the forks road. Where is the church?"

"If anything is central in Christi it is this obliteration of the lin division between races and nationa and the inclusion of the world i brotherhood. Whatever other t might be made subordinate or s dary, this truth of the divine Fathe and the human Brotherhood were lifted into the light and held befor thought of the world. To this the life of Jesus gave marvelous nificance. What he taught, tha was. All ranks and races and c tions found in him a Friend. No can be clearer than that those become his true disciples and are partakers of his spirit will find t selves in fraternal relations with a children of men."

"In spite of her failures, the Chri Church has still been the most b force of history. Wide realms of hu association have felt her softening harmonizing influence. She has ke New Testament in the hands of me the words of Jesus and his life and have made their own mighty impre in spite of the beggarly elements which they are often mingled."

VELVO-TONE FINISH

A Beautiful New Finish for All Woodwork and Furniture

JUST what the name suggests, a soft, velvety finish for furniture and woodwork. Dull, hand-rubbed effects have quite supplanted the old, hard, bright finish. The new, soft, rubbed style of furniture is so much more artistic—so much more fashionable. With Lucas Velvo-Tone Finish you can have this very desirable finish; can make your old furniture new and beautiful.

Stains, Varnishes and Gives Hand-Rubbed Effect in One Operation

Lucas Velvo-Tone Finish does in one operation what formerly required three. It stains the wood, varnishes it, and produces a dull finish. To get this effect formerly took expert skill and hand-rubbing, making hand-rubbed furniture expensive. Now anyone can do it, can have beautiful, up-to-date furniture at slight cost.

Use Velvo-Tone on your old furniture. One 25c can will refinish two chairs. Get Velvo-Tone at your dealer's. If he hasn't it, send us his name and 25c for a can.

Paul's Defense Before Agrippa

International Sunday School Lesson for October 22. Ac 26

A Great Testimony—An Unresponsive Audience

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

PAUL stands now before the most impressive audience he has yet had in his long career. "With great pomp" King Agrippa and his sister-wife Bernice entered the palace of the Roman governor together with an imposing military procession and the principal civil dignitaries of the city. Festus, sitting in his crimson mantle, surrounded by his officials, introduced the prisoner, not for trial but for a hearing as a basis of the letter to Rome. In his bluff way he refers the whole matter to the Jewish prince for his judgment, and the latter calls upon the captive for his defense and an explanation of his predicament. Paul responded to the opportunity with a brilliant speech, a burning personal testimony, red-hot with life and passion, and leading up to a direct religious appeal to his hearers. Yet its effect was practically nil. Many a crude country audience had yielded the foundation of a church to this evangelist. Many a humble city congregation had been swayed by his fervor to share his convictions. But this splendid court listened spiritually unmoved to an address that fills us with admiration today. Let us look into the reason for this.

Idle Religious Curiosity

WHEN Festus had first told Agrippa of the strange religious genius before him, Agrippa had been filled with curiosity. "I have been wishing to hear the man myself." He had heard of Paul's powers and wished to be amused, entertained, that was all. A great many people have this same frivolous religious inquisitiveness. How they run after "some new thing," whether it be New Thought, or Christian Science, Mental Healing, or some less creditable manifestation of religious novelty! A prominent woman was asked why she had joined some new "ism" of the day, and she responded, "Why, it's all the rage." In the columns of the metropolitan dailies are the advertisements of strange new sects, theosophists, spiritualists and what not. Many religion-tasters visit them all, purely from curiosity, not intending at all to live out and work out any of them. Not only is this the case, but our orthodox churches are visited by many "religious tramps," who go from church to church, not to learn the deep things of God, but "to hear the man themselves." It is an unfortunate thing when people wish to "hear a man" instead of hearing the message of the Lord; when they visit a church instead of going to worship God. There are so many who do not build themselves into the body of Christ at all, but are interested in sermons and theologies. Most disheartening of all are those who love to listen and argue the moot points, but who have no convictions or depth of character.

Agrippa professed to be a loyal Jew and exploited his Judaism. He had power to appoint the high priests and used it unscrupulously. He was an expert in Jewish customs and questions and in his heart contemptuous of them all. He was typical of those professors of religion who are actually insincere. He had no appreciation of the higher motives of the prophets, and no intention of repenting of his sins. But it pleased his fancy to dabble in religion and to investigate and hear new preachers. No divine hunger and thirst for the Infinite stirred him, and like innumerable people of to-day he failed to realize that religion is not an interesting side issue of life but its noblest essential. Its great challenge to obey and to trust God and to grow into his likeness is often missed.

Roman Hardness

HOW characteristic of imperial Rome was the interruption of Festus, "Paul, thou art mad!" To the iron-handed soldier, the hardened pr ical administrator of conquered pro ces, the essential Gospel message was bsolutely incredible, and for any man be so earnest about it meant that thusiasm was carrying him to insanit A suffering Redeemer, a dying rist risen from the dead for the salvat n of the world—it was raving luna to Festus's brand of "common s se," and not mere dreamy idealism. hat an illustration of Paul's own stat ent in 1 Cor. 2 : 14, "The natural [un iritual] man receiveth not the things the Spirit of God; for they are fooli ness unto him; neither can he know em, because they are spiritually discer d." Some people seem to be afflicted vith total spiritual blindness and ar humanly speaking, hopeless of conv sion to the ways of Christ.

Paul courteously rebukes the ther rude outburst of the governor, an proceeds to tell of the actual corrobo tive evidence that exists. "I am not iad, most noble Festus. The king kn eth of these things, for this hath not een done in a corner." These practic nen must be reminded of the solid fact pon which the Christian message is sed. The well-authenticated story of sus, firmer in all essentials by reason the searching criticism of our own day the marvelous transformation produc by the apostolic teaching; the great orld faith of the centuries—these co ont any man who, like Festus, conside the whole matter mere speculation.

"Thou Art Mad"

THE Jews thought Jesus was possessed (John 8 : 48), and ltitudes of the noblest Christians ave been thought mad by worldly ids, because of their sacrifices and i als. What madness was it that pos sed those tender maidens who were t own to the lions when a denial of the rist would have made them popular e ugh with the Roman mob? What pos sed Paul to give up his position and rospects at Jerusalem for his hunted, rld-roaming career? How unaccount le a Father Damien, cultured Belgian g duate of Louvain, who esteems a privilege to devote his life to nistering to the unspeakable lepe of Molokai, until at last the fri tful disease fastens upon him! Ma he must have been to feel a certain e ltation when he could first say t his hearers, "We lepers!"

"Madman! Fanatic!" has bee the world's scornful cry whenever a eat daring pioneer has ventured all on his faith. Whether an explore ike Columbus, an inventor like Fult , a reformer like John Howard in hi are for guilty prisoners, or a humanit ian like Owen Lovejoy toiling to fre the negro slaves, the amazed mocke of the unseeing has been heard. nething similar greets any of us who lly takes Christ at his word in busin or in life. What a fatal mistake to ed that sneer! What a glorious thi to join those who are like Wendell illips—

> He stood upon the world's broad thre old: wide
> The din of battle and of slaughter r ;
> He saw God stand upon the weaker si
> That sank in seeming loss before it es:
>
> . . . Therefore he went
> And humbly joined him to the w ker part,
> Fanatic named, and fool, yet well cont t
> So he could be the nearer to God's rt.
> And feel its solemn pulses sending bl l
> Through all the widespread veins of e ess good.

Herodian Cynicism

IT was the wish of the Herods, th gh of mixed origin, to be regard as Jews. Agrippa's father had posed a most scrupulous Pharisee, and he mself liked to be considered an auth ty. So Paul turns to him for partial co boration. "Of course you believe he prophets?" Agrippa dodged the estion, brilliantly he thought. No isoner could catechize him on ma rs of belief. "The next thing I ow y ll be asking me if I am a Christian." H meant it in sarcasm, doubtless, tl gh one could wish he was seriously t hed. His pride, his real scepticism s here, and possibly a little uneasi- of mind. Paul registered the last d, and turned the jest to solemn ort. "I would to God that all of with little persuasion or with h, would become Christians just myself—except these chains."

The Uselessness of the Cynic

ANY people have affected the sarcastic agnosticism of Agrippa. y today assume the pose of cynical fference in the presence of the strife uls with sin. But every man is in crucible of life. Mortal wounds e even to those who do not realize there's a battle on. We can't be sightseers in this world: we are ctors, participants. But the cynic ks he need not take sides, and may loof and sneer at noble enthusiasms spiritual conflicts. This temptation besets some of our most brilliant g people, and not a few college uates come forth already blasé. How much better is that human sympathy and sense of sharing the lot of others which breathes through Sam Walter Foss's well-known lines:

Then why should I sit in the scorner's seat,
  Or hurl the cynic's ban?
Let me live in the house by the side of the road
  And be a friend to man.

A Complete Vindication

IN the days when Luke wrote the Acts, Christians were subject to persecution. Consequently he tells with detail of the many cases where the courts had decided that Paul was guiltless of wrongdoing in his work. Now the Roman procurator and the Jewish king, talking over the matter together, agree that Paul should never have been dragged through all these court-room scenes. However unworldly his view might seem to them, there was clearly no moral or civil danger in them. Nevertheless, his appeal stood, and to Rome he must go. One wonders if the figure and words of this remarkable teacher did not linger long in the minds of the hardened men who had heard him at his best.

Sunday School Methods

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

How to Use the Bible in the Class

question is more important than the ownership and use of the Bible by the ar. The growth of the scholar in Chris- life and service depends upon a love for amiliarity with the Book. No lesson leaf e a satisfactory substitute for the Bible . And the teacher can do no better thing drill the class in the names and locations e books of the Bible and to encourage the ing of its choicest verses and passages.

e superintendent can assist the teacher in by instituting platform Bible drills, and lanning for the recognition of Bible- ing by the scholars and for an occasional of Bibles. Some schools furnish Bibles for n the class session, but it is far better for cholars to bring their own Bibles to the ol. A great many teachers have been l if their scholars brought their Bibles to lass, and what use was made of them dur- he lesson. A teacher of Junior boys re- :

es. We use Bibles very frequently in our drills and in the study of the lesson. times the class builds up the lesson story ghout by reading references."

teacher of eleven-year-old boys says: have Bibles in class and always use them, when a particular book in the Bible is men- d or looked up, I always ask the boys to mber at least one definite story in each . This helps them."

teacher of young ladies has this to say: . 95 per cent. have Bibles with them. I hem to read the lesson in dialogue form, for references."

teacher of high school girls says: "Yes. have graded lessons and bringing your counts 10 per cent. The lesson is always ed from the Bible. A drill is often given, g who can find the references in the est time."

boys' teacher makes this statement: y few of them bring their Bibles, but I ny own and some belonging to the Sunday ol. I have the boys look up given pas- s."

From a teacher of Intermediate girls comes this statement: "Yes. Frequently, during the lesson, I ask questions outside of the immediate lesson, but bearing on it, and have them look up the answer."

A teacher of college girls says: "Yes. No quarterlies or helps are in evidence very often."

A teacher of Junior girls expresses a plan followed by many: "Yes. Sometimes we read the lesson together from the Bibles and sometimes I simply ask them to look up certain references."

A plan followed by a Junior teacher is thus stated: "Yes. Finding and reading of Bible verses in a Bible drill, which we have once a month. The one finding first reads."

A teacher of girls in a mission school says: "No. I give the class pocket lessons for the Sunday school, arranged by H. R. Clissold, published by W. B. Jacobs Company, Chicago. I find they will use that because of its small size when they won't use the quarterlies."

An Intermediate class teacher says: "They use the Bible every lesson. They bring them because we use them constantly, not only for the material in hand but reading references elsewhere."

A training-class teacher replies: "Yes, every one, but mine is a special class, and seeing we are studying the Book as a whole we must make continual use of it."

A method with an adult class is thus explained: "The class librarian sees that each member has a Bible put in her seat before class begins."

A confession comes from a teacher of young men. "I cannot get the young men to bring their Bibles. They don't handle them enough during the week to make them feel at home with them elsewhere."

A teacher of a class of ladies says: "Some of them do bring their Bibles and read verses relating to the lesson, parallel passages, and to settle arguments."

Here is a good plan from a teacher of seventeen-year-old boys: "Yes. We read over the lesson, and then certain members, who have been handed slips with selections, find the place and we discuss that point."

The Second Coming of Christ

HERE is, however, an argument supplementary to that wrought out the late Dr. Tyng upon which the ussion in last week's issue was based, greatly strengthens the conviction the second coming of Christ is perd in the sense of visible. It is that the etymology of the Greek words, nouns, pronouns and adverbs that ribe it.

Take the word Apocalypsis, occur- nineteen times in the New Testat, and translated, "coming," "revion," "appearing," and "manifeson" (I Cor. 1 : 7; II Thess. 1 : 7; eter 1 : 7; 4 : 13). Wherever it is l with reference to what can be gnized by sight, it requires visiy as a necessary quality. As g says, it is sometimes used for the aling of spiritual truth concerning ist to the mind, which is not recogd by physical sight; but it is never l for the spiritual revelation of Christ himself. In other words, there is no such thing as the spiritual revelation of Christ as distinguished from the revelation of the truth concerning him.

2. Epiphancia is another of these words. This and the verb derived from it occur in ten passages, and mean "the appearance of a thing corporeal and resplendent." Eight out of the ten passages refer to the second coming of Christ (compare, for example, I Tim. 6 : 14; II Tim. 4 : 1; Titus 2 : 13).

3. Parousia is a commoner word, occurring 24 times, and translated sometimes "coming," and sometimes "presence." It means literally, "the becoming present," or, as our author says, it marks "the moment when absence ceases and presence begins." (Compare Matt. 24 : 3, 27; I Cor. 15 : 23; I Thess. 2 : 19; James 5 : 8). In still other places it describes the coming of individuals like Stephanos, Titus and Paul himself (I Cor. 16 : 17; II Cor. 7 : 6; Phil. 1 : 26). If their coming were personal and visible, the inference is strong that it will be the same in the case of Christ.

4. Passing from the nouns to the pronouns and adverbs, consider Acts 1 : 11, already quoted: "This same Jesus . . . . shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go." Or I Thess. 4 : 16, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout." Or Heb. 9 : 28, "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time." "Here is an antithesis between 'once' and the 'second time,' and the resemblance between the two is personality."

If space permitted, still another line of argument or proof that the second coming of Christ is to be personal and visible could be found in the offices and actions connected with the Second Advent.

1. For instance, a great event connected with it is the translation of the church "to meet the Lord in the air" (I Thess. 4 : 17). It is pointed out that "the Greek word 'to meet' has the uniform meaning of a personal encounter." On the other hand, if the resurrection or translation of our bodies will be personal and visible, it is difficult to believe that the same will not be true of him into whose likeness we are then to be transformed.

2. Another event is that of judgment. It is written that God "hath appointed a day, in which he will judge the world by that Man whom He hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance . . . . in that he hath raised him from the dead" (Acts 17 : 30, 31). "That man" is of course a personal designation, and if his resurrection was visible, his second advent for judgment would seem necessarily to be the same.

3. Again, Christ warns his disciples against the false Christs who shall appear prior to his coming. "Wherefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth; behold, he is in the secret chambers; believe it not" (Matt. 24 : 26). These Antichrists are personal and visible very evidently, and the same seems to be true in the case of him with whom they are contrasted. So we may say that for these reasons and many more "we look for our King clothed in glorified flesh."

To Take His Lost Darling's Place

It is seldom that we receive a letter that has touched us so deeply as this, which came to us in the morning's mail a few days ago:

"My little girl is dead and I am heartbroken. She was my playfellow—my chum—and her going has left me desolate.

"I am seeking another to take her place—one having her mentality and, so far as possible, her appearance.

"My little girl was a laughing, sweet-tempered, tender-hearted, sweet-voiced, and very affectionate child. She was small, dainty, and very pretty, with dark brown hair and hazel eyes. She was Merriment personified—her bright eyes and rosy cheeks, her jolly laugh, all spelled glee.

"I want such a child, one between five and eight or nine years, of good American parentage, and a full orphan.

"I want a child to love and cherish—a child to love me as mine did—a child in whom my little one can live again.

"Can the Christian Herald help find such a child? It would mean a good home for her, and much, so much, to me. It would bring sunshine back to my lonely, desolate home. Can you do anything? Please advise."

Accompanying the letter was the following note:

"Who Wants a Home?

"A NEW YORK STATE judge, whose little girl has lately died, wants another to take her place. Should be a full orphan, of good American parentage, well bred, and from five to eight years of age. His little girl was small, dainty, a laughing, sweet-tempered, and very affectionate child; very pretty, with rosy cheeks, dark brown hair and hazel eyes. We shall be pleased to hear from any one who may be interested." All letters on the subject should be addressed "Orphan Girl," The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

The Crimes We Commit Against Our Stomachs

By Arthur True Buswell, M. D.

Eugene Christian

A MAN'S success in life depends more on the co-operation of his stomach than on any other factor. Just as an "army moves on its stomach" so does the individual. Scientists tell us that 90 per cent of all sickness is traceable to the digestive tract.

As Dr. Orison Swett Marden, the noted writer, says, "the brain gets an immense amount of credit which really should go to the stomach." And it's true—keep the digestive system in shape and brain vitality is assured.

Food is the fuel of the human system, yet some of the combinations of food we put into our systems are as dangerous as dynamite, soggy wood and a little coal would be in a furnace—and just about as effective. Is it any wonder that the average life of man today is but 39 years—and that diseases of the stomach, liver and kidneys have increased 103 per cent during the past few years!

And yet just as wrong food selections and combinations will destroy our health and efficiency, so will the right foods create and maintain bodily vigor and mental energy. And by right foods we do not mean freak foods—just good, every-day foods properly combined. In fact, to follow Corrective Eating it isn't even necessary to upset your table.

Not long ago I had a talk with Eugene Christian, the noted food scientist, who is said to have successfully treated over 23,000 people without drugs or medicines of any kind, and he told me of some of his experiences in the treatment of disease through food.

One case that interested me greatly was that of a young business man whose efficiency had been practically wrecked through stomach acidity, fermentation and constipation resulting in physical sluggishness which was naturally reflected in his ability to use his mind. He was twenty pounds under weight when he first went to see Christian and was so nervous he couldn't sleep. Stomach and intestinal gases were so severe that they caused irregular heart action and often fits of great mental depression. As Christian describes it he was not 50 per cent efficient either mentally or physically. Yet in a few days, by following Christian's suggestions as to food, his constipation had completely gone although he had formerly been in the habit of taking large daily doses of a strong cathartic. In five weeks every abnormal symptom had disappeared—his weight having increased 6 lbs. In addition to this he acquired a store of ysic. and mental energy so great in compari wit his former self as to almost belie the f tha it was the same man.

Another instance of what proper fo con binations can do was that of a man one ndre pounds over-weight whose only other scon fort was rheumatism. This man's eate pleasure in life was eating. Though cc ince of the necessity, he hesitated for mont to g under treatment believing he wc d t deprived of the pleasures of the tab H finally, however, decided to try it ou Nc only did he begin losing weight at once, ickl regaining his normal figure, all signs of uma tism disappearing, but he found the r die far more delicious to the taste and af ded much keener quality of enjoyment t n h old method of eating and he wrote Ch ian letter to that effect.

But perhaps the most interesting c tha Christian told me of was that of a nult millionaire—a man 70 years old who h bee traveling with his doctor for several ye s in search for health. He was extremely em iatec had chronic constipation, lumbago and uma tism. For over twenty years he had ffere with stomach and intestinal trouble v ch i reality was superaciduous secretions i th stomach. The first menus given hi wer designed to remove the causes of acidity vhic was accomplished in about thirty day An after this was done he seemed to un rgo complete rejuvenation. His eyesight, aring taste and all of his mental faculties cam keener and more alert. He had had no gani trouble—but he was starving to deat fron malnutrition and decompositon—all ausec by the wrong selection and combina on o foods. After six months' treatment tl mai was as well and strong as he had ever en i his life.

These instances of the efficacy c righ eating I have simply chosen at idon from perhaps a dozen Eugene Christi tolc me of, every one of which was fully s in teresting and they applied to as many d erent ailments. Surely this man Christian i loing a great work.

There have been so many inquiries f m all parts of the United States from people eking the benefit of Eugene Christian's adv and whose cases he is unable to handle pe nally that he has written a little course of ssons which tells you exactly what to eat for alth, strength and efficiency.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, tain actual menus for breakfast, lunche and dinner, curative as well as corrective, c ering every condition of health and sicknes from infancy to old age and for all occup ions, climates and seasons.

With these lessons at hand it is t as though you were in personal contact w the great food specialist, because every p sible point is so thoroughly covered and arly explained that you can scarcely thin of a question which isn't answered. Simplicity

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

I WAS talking about a magazine to he Young Poet. "The editor rites the most wonderful 'talks' I've ever read," I ventured.

"es?" agreed the Young Poet a bit do tfully. "Yes? They are—good."

take it," I murmured, "that you ar t as enthusiastic about them as I ."

'm not," admitted the Young Po "Of course, I realize that the id back of them are fine, and that th are well done. But they hardly se beautiful en gh to me."

Why don't th seem beau-tif " I ques-tic d.

'hey are al-mo too simple," s wered the Y g Poet al-m t wearily. 'ey haven't th beauty that th might have, be use they are so mple. The w s are so sim-pl hat they miss th delicate shad-in hat less sim-pl words would sh ." He paused th went on with a sh. "I could ne r, never have th deas that that m has given to th world with hi editorials," he to me, "but I co d take one of hi deas and polish it, and rewrite it, an make it beautiful—a masterpiece of riting."

Molly's Charm

MOLLY ain t got eddication,
But her smile
Makes yer heart seem full o' sun-shine
All the while.
Though the song she sings is simple,
It's so gay
That it makes yer sorter happy
All the day.

Molly can't spell, but her letters
To a man
Makes him want ter do the very Best he can.
An' her words o' cheer an' comfort,
Joy an' mirth
Makes yer feel that heaven's closer
To the earth.

Molly never had much schoolin',
But my life
Would be awful sad 'thout Molly
For my wife.
Jus' ter see the life she's livin'
Is like prayer—
Molly ain't got eddication. . . .
I don't care!

But," I questioned, "would every-bo understand your beautiful edi-to ls? Would the tired clerks and the li shopgirls and the busy housewives fi time to read them? Would they w t to find time? Would they under-st d them if they did find time?"

he Young Poet laughed. "Frankly," h old me, "I don't think they would. B even if they didn't I would be satis-fi , for I'd know that I had given so ething beautiful to the world!"

A the argument was dropped there.

he particular articles we had been sp king of were simple editorials—so si ple that a child could understand th n; so very simple that the words w all well-known words of not many s ables. So simple that after reading t n one felt that he had been shaking h ds with the writer. So simple that one f the glow of happiness and friendliness a good-will shining through them.

I WENT to the dinner, last winter, of a club of rather interesting people. T re were a number of well-known w ers sitting at the speaker's table, a I was not a little curious to hear t n talk. For most of them were p ple that the whole world respected.

'he first speaker who talked to us w an authority on affairs political a social. His talk was clever and b liant, but many of his terms were t nical, and many of his phrases were f above the average mind. Most o he minds at that dinner were average m ds. His talk was brilliant, but, t ard the end of it, one could feel an u asiness creep through the room. One c ld feel a certain lack of warmth and a ind of interest that was hardly more t n politeness. When the man sat d n he was applauded vigorously by a umber of learned-looking men; half-h rtedly by the majority of the dinner g sts.

'hen the next speaker stood up. She w s a middle-aged woman with a sunny f e and silver hair—a woman well k own as a newspaper and magazine w ter. She looked amusedly around t room and smiled, and her smile s med to touch each one of us, per-s ally, with a warm little greeting. 'en she began to talk.

I can't remember what she talked about. (But then I can't remember what the man talked about, either.) But I do remember how the tension in that room relaxed, how people leaned forward to catch her every word. I do remember how folks who had been obviously bored were now keenly interested. And I noticed that the group of learned-looking men were just as interested as any of the others.

The woman's simple little speech was punctuated with amusing incidents and tiny chuckly jokes. I remember thinking, as I laughed with the rest, that our cook, or the kiddie next door, or the minister, would have enjoyed the talk every bit as much as I did.

I'm willing to admit that the man's speech was the best speech as far as literary value, and cleverness, and real learning were concerned. But most of us didn't understand it at all. The woman's speech was not startlingly original, perhaps, and it was certainly not brilliant, but it was friendly and charming, and everybody understood it. So I can't help thinking that her speech was the most successful one of the two.

ROBERT BROWNING was a genius. The whole world recognizes that. But many of his most beautiful poems are so involved and hard to understand that even students, who readily recognize their beauty, cannot interpret them. His poems will always give a marvelous amount of pleasure to a certain audience; but they will never be understood by the greater audience.

James Whitcomb Riley was also a genius. Perhaps, though, the whole world does not recognize the fact. But all his poems (and they are beautiful poems, too) any one, even a child, can understand. All of his audiences are able to laugh with him, and weep with him; to know him and to love him.

It seems to me, somehow, that simple things are, after all, the most beautiful and satisfactory. For they give pleasure to every one. And simple things may be just as beautiful as things that are involved and hard to understand. Write your stories, and your verses, and whatever you write, simple enough for any intellect to grasp, and the great minds will usually enjoy your work too. But if you make your work so technically perfect and wonderfully worded that it is obscure—so obscure that only great minds can understand it—you'll be depriving many simple folk of enjoyment that you might otherwise have given them.

What do you think about it, friends o' mine? Is a perfect bit of work, be it music or art or literature—a perfect bit that only a few can understand—better than a simple song, or story, or picture, that all can know and love?

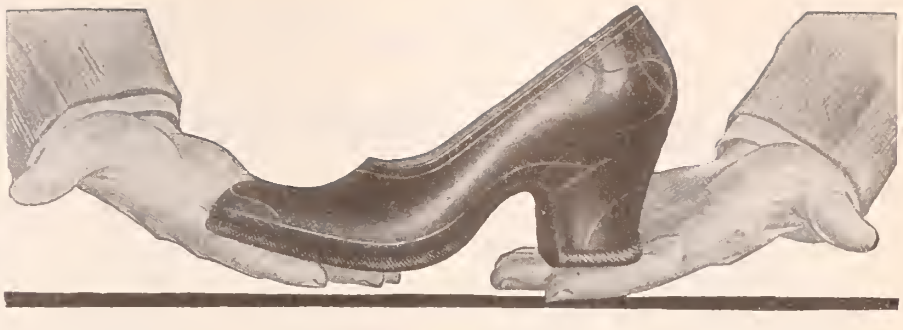
Pension Funds Growing. Bishop William Lawrence, President of the Church Pension Fund of the Episcopal Church, announced on September first that more than $3,000,000 had been pledged toward the pension fund, all these pledges being contingent upon the raising of $5,000,000 by March 1, 1917. It was announced at the same time that the Presbyterians had collected nearly one-half of the ten-million-dollar fund for aged and disabled ministers and their dependents.



We beg your indulgence for not telling you years sooner about these rubbers which "wear like Goodrich Tires."

—they OUTWEAR TWO PAIRS OF THE BEST OF OTHER STANDARD BRANDS. We sold over 20,000,000 pairs of "Straight-Line" the past TEN YEARS—WITHOUT A SINGLE WORD OF ADVERTISING.

WHY?—simply because they give SO MUCH MORE WEAR and SO MUCH BETTER FIT that dealer and wearer "word-of-mouth-advertising" has kept us so busy that we couldn't begin to keep up with the demand—let alone advertise.

It is the greatest success in the history of rubber footwear. Superior materials and 47 years of Goodrich Rubber Knowledge alone made it possible.

And now, with tremendously increased factory production, we can tell YOU, Mr. Wearer, Mrs. Wearer and all the Little Wearers, about "Straight-Line" in the hope that we can now keep up with YOUR demand.

The next time you buy a pair of rubbers for yourself or the kiddies ask for "Straight-Line"—not just "a pair of rubbers." Sold everywhere—in over 38,000 stores.

One Food Which Does Not Rise in Price

The increasing cost of meat and white flour has naturally led to widespread protest in all parts of the country—and this protest in many cities and towns invokes the aid of food commissioners and health authorities in an effort to find the cause.

So far as the bakers are concerned, it is easy for them to find an excuse for a small loaf at a larger price in the increasing cost of wheat.

Shredded wheat biscuit is always the same price and always the same high quality. Two biscuits served with milk or cream and fresh fruit make a complete, perfect, delicious meal at a cost of only three or four cents.

You Always Travel First-Class in a Hudson Super-Six Touring Sedan

HERE is a car on which all will agree. Which all can enjoy at any season. And which anyone can drive. When you want a Touring Car, you have one with the sides entirely open. When you want a closed car, lift the windows and you have an elegant Sedan. There is all the luxury and comfort, all the fine appointments that a dainty woman likes.

If the day is fair, you have a Touring Car. If a storm comes up, you have a Sedan. The change may be made in a minute. In winter you have warmth and comfort. In summer you have airiness. All in the same car.

This is a one-compartment car. The woman may drive, if she wishes, without being separate. When the disappearing seat is down, the car has seats for six. This is a very popular model. We are building this year, to meet the demand, ten times as many as last year.

This Touring Sedan has the Super-Six motor, patented by Hudson. Vibration and friction in this motor are reduced almost to nil. Motor efficiency is increased 80 per cent. Endurance is almost doubled.

This is the motor which has broken all the stock car records. It has proved itself the greatest motor built. No man who knows it as it is will buy a fine car without it. So this Touring Sedan combines in one car all the best things you can look for.

Progress of the Bible Pi ur Contest

WHILE awaiting the decisio f th Judges who are now exa nin the verses submitted, contestant n th Bible Picture Contest will no dc bt b interested in some of the unusu epi sodes that enlivened the final d s fo accepting sets of answers.

The clerks assigned to enr th thousands of sets of answers tha am to the Christian Herald offic wer instructed to make a thorough ex ina tion of each package. They oun hundreds of Reply Books withou am and address of the contestant, bu wer able to identify them by the na an address on the outside wrapper Ye it was absolutely impossible to redi fifty-two sets of answers to a on because of the total absence o am and address.

One of the packages when ene revealed a pasteboard box—v hou contents, and a total absence an address or name. The empty b wa naturally a puzzle to us, but the swe came the following day in a p eti letter from an earnest contest t i Ohio.

On the final day for mailing set of answers this contestant, a fa ner' wife, having completed her set an swers, was in a quandary as to h sh could get the package to the pos ffic that day. The hay crop was eing gathered and no one could be are from the field. She finally arra d t take the place of one of the me hil he drove many miles to the post fice That evening she was greatly ast she to find her Reply Book under some aga zines on the library table. Tl bo had been wrapped, addressed and aile —but the set of answers overl ked It was too late to mail then tha evening—the post office had cl d.

A somewhat similar misfortun ver took another contestant who l d long distance from the post fice Several days before the closing y o the Contest the Reply Bool wa wrapped and addressed and the ack age placed in the auto and t trip made to the post office. Wh the post office was reached the p kage could not be found. Evidently had fallen out of the car. A searc was immediately made on the rea but darkness came on before it co be completed. The hunt was con ued the following day, but the p kage could not be found. It turned p a week later—a neighbor came ac ss it on the side of the road and retu d it to the owner, but after the closi day of the Contest.

Clams Enter the News. The American pearl button industry said to be seriously threatened b the scarcity of fresh-water clams, rom whose shell pearl buttons are ade. The abnormally wet summer is s d to have caused extraordinary curre s in the streams, which have torn th us sels from their beds, and the u sual demand for labor has made cla dig ging unprofitable, both conditio re sulting in a lessening of the num r of shells on the market. The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

NEVER is there a dearth of requests to be submitted to the Prayer League. The mails every day during the current week have brought us communications covering many phases of human suffering and distress, creating situations in which the individual is driven to seek comfort from the only Source whence consolation and help can come.

A merchant in Pennsylvania writes: "I am in great financial embarrassment owing to the failure of a number of people who owe me notes and accounts, and to the bankruptcy of one who owes me a large sum of money. I have large liabilities to meet soon, but have enough real estate to offer in security. Have been making a desperate effort to sell. Will you kindly ask the Prayer League to plead that I may be enabled, with God's help, to overcome my difficulties?"

A lady in New Jersey writes: "All summer long, our little town has been under quarantine, though without sickness. When the ban was lifted on September 15, sickness came, throwing everything into confusion, so that we must keep our Sunday school closed, and we cannot hold our Harvest Home Festival, and our children are not permitted to go out of our dooryards. I ask the Prayer League to send up petitions in behalf of the suffering family. Pray that the sick may recover."

A Reader in Ambler, Pa., writes: "To me, the Christian Herald is the greatest help next to the Bible. I have been reading about the Prayer League and wish to make a personal request. Two weeks ago I had all my pay stolen from me, and I need to meet bills. I would request the League to pray for the thief, that he may repent, make restoration and become a new man. I have no desire to put him into the hands of the law."

An Old Reader writes asking the prayers of the League that a widow's son may be cured of evil habits, his mind and body strengthened, and his heart won to Christ.

A Reader in Corinth, Vt., requests prayers that a cloud of accusation against him may lift, and that his innocence of a certain serious charge may be made clear and the esteem and confidence of friends and relatives restored.

C. E. B., Bradford, Pa., desires prayers for the safety and recovery, if still living, of a missing brother, an elder in a church, who, while traveling in the West for his health, has disappeared, probably during some attack of vertigo or heart trouble to which he is subject. His clothes and valuables were found on the banks of a river, but the hope is entertained that he may still be living. The writer adds, "I myself pray for those, making requests every day, sometimes before noon if possible."

Subscriber, Tallula, Ill., writes: "I have been greatly interested in your accounts of the Prayer League experiences, and have wondered what the intercession of the League might do for me, in view of what it is doing for others. I ask the prayers of the League for full restoration to health, and for a strengthened memory; also that my financial affairs may be arranged satisfactorily, and that justice may be done; also that I may be enabled to take a better and saner view of life than heretofore, and may have the blessed assurance of full divine forgiveness."

A lady in La Harpe, Kan., writes: "Some time ago I wrote asking for prayers for a young woman greatly afflicted, and I am glad to say that they are now being answered. She is now a thoroughly good Christian, besides being zealous in doing all she can to lead others to Christ. The Lord certainly has been good in bringing about this great change. I want to request your prayers that the Lord may send his blessing and power to the church meetings and union prayer meetings which are now being held here. Your prayers for my sister's and my own health are being answered."

A Reader in Shenandoah, Pa., requests prayers for "the complete recovery of a young girl of twenty from a severe nervous affliction."

PRAYERS are asked for revivals of religion at: New London, N. H.; Pleasanton, Kan.; Woodward, Okla.; Coffeeville, Miss.; Montreal, Quebec, Canada; Spencer, W. Va.; Toshes, Va.; Green City, Mo.; Lexington, Ga.; Gainesville, Fla. (pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon a revival service); Litchfield, Mich. (for the success of revival in October); Piney Neck, Md. (that many may be saved during revival here); Canyon Falls, Ky. (that many souls may be saved during revival); La Harpe, Kan. (that many may be saved during revival in our town); Gettysburg, Pa. (pray for the success of Nicholson-Hemminger evangelistic work).

A Reader, R. O., asks prayer that a mother's mind may be restored; a Friend, that a child's mind may be restored; S. E. P. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; eleven friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives or friends or for themselves.

Five friends ask prayer that their sight may be restored; K. B. asks prayer that eyes may be healed; Mrs. L. R. L., C. M., that a mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. S. J. S., for a nephew's eyesight; Mrs. M. B. R., for a friend's eyesight.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace and assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Ten parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; Mrs. M. C. H. asks prayer that three sons may be cured of the habit; A Subscriber asks similar prayers for a father and sons; three wives ask prayer for their husbands; eight ask prayers that friends or relatives may be delivered from the liquor habit.

D. N. asks prayer to be cured of the drug habit; also Mrs. G. G. S., that a man may be cured; Mrs. A. K. T., that a son may be cured, and M. O. T., that a son-in-law may be cured.

Thirty-four parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty-two wives for the conversion of their husbands; fifty-five readers ask for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Four readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others.

Seventy-eight ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including L. A., that a sister may pass safely through an operation; another, Mrs. M. J. S., that a sister may regain the use of limbs; another, M. R. G., that a brother may be restored to health; another, Mrs. A. A. B., that a friend may be cured of cancer; another, Miss E. R. S., that a physician may be restored to health; sixty-one friends ask prayers for healing for themselves, including a wife who asks that health may be restored without an operation; twelve friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

One hundred eighteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs, including M. L. B., who asks prayer for means to establish a home for the aged in a locality where it is much needed.

One hundred forty-five friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answers to prayer have been received from the following:

A Mother, Washington, D. C.; J. F. S., Newtonville, Mass.; Mrs. J. M. B., Edon, Ohio; Mrs. J. A. N., Newbury, Mass.; S. T. S., Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. C. B. J., Farmersville, Tex.; C. M. B., Dinuba, Calif.; Mrs. A. S. C., Gloucester County, N. J.; A Subscriber, Pinewood, S. C.; Mrs. G. W. S., Sandusky, Ohio; S. E. I., Princeton, Fla.; C. M. K., Athens, Ill.; S. E. Cause and Effect

"Now, you see how nice I look; but you don't know how nice I feel. I'm what Mamma calls 'the Effect.'

"What do you think is the 'Cause'?

"Mamma says its Fels-Naptha soap, the wonder-worker that keeps me and all the rest of the house, inside and out, in apple-pie trim, WITHOUT ANY FUSS ABOUT IT!"

Fels-Naptha does work wonders all by itself, if set properly to its duties according to the directions on the wrapper.

The daintiest wear of the daintiest little maiden, and also the rougher operations of house-cleaning, it's all the same.

Fels-Naptha is an all-'round household cleanser, yet strangely enough some people think it useful for one thing only — the one they happened first to have used it for!

Wherever soap is used—use Fels-Naptha and get the benefit of its great value for yourself. Use it the better, easier, quicker, cheaper way. Use it the Fels-Naptha way.

Fels-Naptha, 10 bars in carton, or by single bar.

(LLOYD-GEORGE)

Russia has been slow to arouse, but she will be equally slow to quiet. The resentment of the Russian against having been forced into war is deep. He has neither forgotten nor forgiven the fact that this happened when he was ill prepared and unsuspecting. No, there are and will be no quitters among the Allies. "Never again" has become our battle cry.

At home the suffering and sorrow is great and is growing. As to the war zone, its terrors are indescribable. I have just visited the battlefields of France. I stood, as it were, at the door of hell. I saw myriads marching into the furnace. I saw some coming out of it, scorched and mutilated.

This ghastliness must never be reenacted on this earth, and one method at least of answering that end is the infliction of such punishment upon the perpetrators of this outrage against humanity that the temptation to emulate their exploits will be eliminated from the hearts of the evil minded among the rulers of men.

What gives us force to stand i this struggle against almost the entire orld if not love for the land of our fathers, hich unites all its sons with an unsev ble bond; if not the uncorrupted fo of arms and hearts which lives at the ck-bottom of our national life and from hich new generations arise?

Great tasks which await us in a domains of state, and of social, econom and political life need all the vital solid ces of our nation. It is necessary for the ate in order to conquer all obstacles th we must find these forces .and use the for the common weal. Let us clear th oad for all that are fit.

Let us follow this watchword in en-minded spirit and our empire will ad nce toward the future in which the best the nation from all ranks and classes dly will participate in the works of peac just as is done now in this sanguinary st gle.

The British moved south from their positions on the northerly line, the French north from their positions on the southerly line, and after really ferocious fighting succeeded in meeting with Combles to the west of their line, and the German troops therein completely cut off from any communication with their fellows on the easterly side of the Allies' new line. But Combles, though cut off, was not taken, nor was it taken till after two days of what is described as the hardest street fighting the war has yet seen, the Germans shut up therein preferring to sell their lives dearly rather than surrender.

While these things were taking place to the west behind the new Allied line, to the east the fighting was also very severe. The Allies, who rushed men into their new line from its north and south ends by the thousands, immediately began an advance against the German positions fronting them, which the Germans resisted valiantly but in vain. In a couple of days of incessant fighting day and night, Frégicourt, about a mile directly north of Rancourt, Morgal, farther north and a mile or so eastward of the old line, and Les Bœufs, still farther north, passed into the possession of the Allies, whose troops then became also firmly established on the line connecting these villages.

From this point, both the old and new lines of the Allies change direction and run in a nearly straight line east and west, instead of, as before, north and south. A place named Courcelette is at approximately the middle of this east-and-west front, and from the eastern extremity of this east and west line to La Courcelette, the Allies continued to gain ground and succeeded in penetrating about a mile on a six-mile front to directly south of Bapaume and about three miles therefrom, so that this gain is an important one, since it is in the very direction of one of the primary objectives of the whole offensive.

Farther west, at the point where the north line of the Allies' offensive started on July 1, the Allies realized another important gain. Thiepval, a village located at this junction point, has been three-quarters surrounded for nearly three months, but was so strenuously defended by the Germans that all of the repeated efforts of the Allies to take it came to naught. A final attack the past week was successful, and not only did the British capture Thiepval, but pushed a couple of thousand yards north of the village, and thus straightened their line to Courcelette, a couple of miles to the east.

Several thousand Germans were taken prisoners in this movement; a considerable quantity of artillery, and a large amount of munitions of war of all kinds, also, fell to the victors. The casualties are reported to be enormous, but as this is a natural sequence of a frontal attack on well defended positions it can hardly be called surprising.

Aviators on both sides have been very active, as many as thirty-five aerial combats being reported in one day. Great Britain has been raided by Zeppelins three times during the past week, but according to the British with no military results. The casualties, however, were reported as considerable.

At present the submarines are very active; all told, last week, from forty to fifty steamers were sunk, the majority of which were British.

THE Grecian situation continues of the highest interest. Venizelos, former prime minister, has left Athens and gone to Crete, where a revolution has been started, at the head of which he is reported to have placed himself. This revolution is apparently connected with the one which recently broke out in Salonica, and is reported to have spread to Corfu, Mitylene, and other places.

In Athens everything seems to be upset. One day it is announced that the government has finally decided to join the Allies, the next day that nothing has been decided on. The Greek government through its ministers has notified the neutral powers that as mea of communication with the outside w d ha been seized by the Allies, it decline esposibility for news emanating from Gr e.

The north Rumanian front in Tra lvani or on the borders of that Austrian ovin has been fairly lively. In the weste secto around Petroseny, the Teutons aft as a ready stated, recapturing the tow dro south and retook the Vulcan and otl pass leading through the chain of mounta s for ing the frontier, and took up positic on t southern slope of the mountains on l nani soil. But this triumph was short- ed, during the latter portion of the peri und consideration the Rumanians, who d be reinforced, returned to the assault l com pelled their adversaries to retire thr gh t passes to their own soil.

In the Dobrudja, in spite of confl ing r ports of victory, it would appear at t contending armies have reached a adloc The Rumanians and Russians, who a behi a fortified line running east and west om t Black Sea to the Danube, south of K tendj appear capable of holding that line ut i capable of sallying forth and dri g t Bulgaro-Teutons south, while on t oth hand, the Bulgaro-Teutons do not s n ab to pierce the Rumanian line.

War Prisoners Long for Bibles

RECENT operations on the eastern front of the European War have made many changes, but have not pened the prison camps, where mu udes of soldiers have been confine since they were captured in the ear campaigns of 1914 and 1915 by the erman and Austrian forces. The opp tunity for the distribution of Go l literature among these prisoners hich has already been described in evious issues of the Christian He d, is continued because of the pro igation of the war. Depressed by heir long captivity and with a lon g for which only spiritual healing ca vail, they find in God's Word that wh comforts, heartens and transfor .

ders who have contributed to our Go l Fund for War Prisoners will rejoic n what is being done in the camps as scribed in letters received by the Go l Committee, extracts from which foll :

“ccept my hearty thanks for the Ru an tracts. I did not expect such a antity, therefore the joy was gre er. I immediately reported to the Ru ans, saying, ‘Russian tracts and boo are here. If any are desired, the may be had.’ As I live right in ear with the prisoners, it required no mo than five minutes before they came in eat haste, like hungry wolves, to rec e the tracts. They were accepted wit many thanks, and many of the Ru ans here bade me send the gentleme who sent the tracts hearty thanks for he same, saying, ‘The books are goo —everything very good—a great y.’

“he two Bibles were a source of gre joy, as were also the books and Go els. They are read constantly; gro s assemble and are read to, as all ca ot read, and therefore one who can rea explains it to them. There were so Russian Jews who also desired tra s, but they hesitated to take them as e name of Jesus was mentioned thr ghout. I then gave them the Le ers to the Hebrews,’ and at once they were happy, and immediately read these ‘letters.’”

“The Russians are the most receptive. I found a Russian one day deeply interested in a large book, which I found to be the Bible. He had gotten it from a comrade. In his broken German, he said to me, ‘I always read the Bible—it is good—Jesus Christ, heaven. Officer should read it also.’ I then called an interpreter and through him told the man that the Bible was also my beloved book, and therein I had found my Saviour, who forgave my sins, gave me a new heart, and now I know that my name is written in heaven. ‘He is mine and I am his.’ Naturally we had many listeners, but now his eyes shone, and I told him and the others, through the interpreter, that they must also come to Jesus. This Russian man then worked diligently with his countrymen, and soon brought to me another man in order that I might tell him more through the interpreter. As this second man came from camp he said to me, with his Bible in his hand and pointing his finger upwards, ‘There no Russians, no Germans, no French all brothers—no war and death and blood. We shall see each other in heaven again.’

“So it was every day that God's word bore fruit, and was a source of great interest and help to many in the barracks. The inward suffering is very great here. Many have been prisoners for almost two years, and in all this time have heard nothing from wives and children. Many tears have been shed over this, and so in their suffering God's word appeals to them, and they receive it gladly. So great good is being wrought during these hard times. God will bless us still more, and you also, in the work you are doing, and he will repay you. ‘I was in prison and ye visited me.’”

All contributions in aid of the Gospel Work Among War Prisoners should be sent to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, which is in direct touch with the work in the field through the committee.

Delivered from Pirates by Prayer

THRILLING experiences with river pirates are narrated by the Rev. W H. Dobson of Yeungkong, South Ch a. After a day spent at Macao, en ute from Hongkong to Yeungkong, wi his helpers, they and their boat we in the hands of a robber band for tw nights and a day and were then ca adrift with only the foresail and oa rs. They finally dropped anchor ne a place called Wongchung, a noted pir e nest. Two miles from there was a ch el. Mr. Dobson sent a messenger wi his card to the preacher or elder ask g him to come and see him. The eld did so, accompanied by a bodygu l, armed, as the country was infes l by robbers. The only way for M Dobson to get his boat into Kongmo , twenty miles away, was to leave the rew and start from the chapel, two mi distant, to get help. “I went into my unk room,” writes Mr. Dobson, “a asked God if there was anything I c ld do for these people before I left, an immediately the answer came—‘In all thy ways acknowledge Him, an he will direct thy paths.’ So, calling he crew together, I called their atte on to the fact that the light had be burning before their ship's idol all du g the robber raid, and that the idol ha in no wise helped them; but now, if ey would consent to blow out the lig and not light it again all night, I uld ask the true God to guard them all uring the night, and give them an ea means of getting into Kongmoon on the morrow. They immediately we and blew out the light. Then I as l God to protect them and take th to Kongmoon, and further said th. I asked this in order that those who we standing around might know that ou God is a true God, who hears and an ers prayer.”

r. Dobson left the crew and went on o the village and the gates were locked behind him. On leaving the next morning, to his surprise the boat on which he was traveling stopped where the junk he had left the night before lay at anchor. He asked whether they had been molested. They replied, “No, indeed, we had a fine rest, doctor.” “I asked them,” said Mr. Dobson, “to whom we prayed last night, and then they said, ‘Heavenly Father.’ The first thing they saw in the morning was two launches, towing boats full of soldiers, who promised to take them into Kongmoon that afternoon.” Kongmoon was reached in safety.

Winona's Moral Burden

THE new directorate of the Winona Assembly is organizing a movement to reimburse the needy creditors of the old Winona Association, and is endeavoring to raise a fund for that purpose. The obligation is not a legal but a moral one. In a letter to the Christian Herald, Chairman Biederwolf and his associates on the Board write that the movement meets with general approval. Some of the original investors are now in reduced circumstances and the refunding of their investment would be a godsend to them. The new Winona, while having no liability for the old organization, is taking up the burden loyally for the sake of justice and humanity. Any one interested in the subject can secure full information by writing to Rev. S. C. Dickey, Winona Assembly, Winona, Ind.

"JUST DAVID"

By Eleanor H. Porter

Everyone who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book.

"LITTLE SIR GALAHAD"

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

Young People's Topics for October

Manliness and Womanliness

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic.
Neh. 6 : 1-13; Esther 44 : 6-16.

MANLINESS and womanliness are alike in all essential qualities. Each must be shot through with the fire of a worthy purpose; each must stand to its task unflinchingly: and each must go forward unswervingly, resisting all allurements and all temptations that would balk or neutralize that purpose. Manliness braves danger, defies traducers and brands misrepresentation for what it is. So does womanliness. The world has had enough of wishy-washy folks who dress well, talk prettily and drift pleasantly with the crowd. Humanity has little use for those who start out bravely to build a wall or a house or a boat or a life, and who tire when the enterprise is half finished. Mankind has enshrined as heroes those men and women who have dared to go through to the end.

We like to read the story of Esther. It is a pretty story, but that is not the reason for our liking. It is a story of a Hebrew girl, peculiarly situated to serve her people, who in answer to the question, "Who knoweth whether thou art not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" asked her people to pray and to fast for her for three days, and then went in unto the king, contrary to the law, saying "If I perish, I perish."

We like Nehemiah because, having been commissioned to rebuild the wall and to restore the temple at Jerusalem, he refused to be diverted by the insidious opposition of Sanballat. It was a manly man who answered, "I am doing a great work. . . . Why should the work cease while I leave it?" It was a fearless man who met the false threat of danger with the question, "Should such a man as I flee?"

Nehemiah and Esther had the courage of righteousness. Cowardice, the antithesis of manliness and womanliness, is often rooted in a guilty conscience. There can be neither manliness nor womanliness if sin grips the heart; for sin, sooner or later, draws the fires of purpose and leaves the sinner cowering amid the ruin of what might have b

Among the Workers

TSINGTAU station of the Shantung Mission, China, reports a bright outlook for the coming months. Mrs. Cassat of the station writes: "We sometimes feel, in these days of hardship and sufferings of the Belgians, Poles and Balkan peoples, that the people of the home churches do not realize that conditions in some parts of China are equally bad, if not sometimes worse. Thousands of Chinese right here in our own field were actually starving until the wheat crop of last month was harvested, the first good crop of any kind in three years. Mr. Montgomery writes that the Chinese are weary of a multitude of gods that can neither put food into their mouths nor bring peace and solace to hungry, yearning souls, and they stand ready as never before to accept Christ and believe in the one living and true God. In the outlying districts eighty-four new communicants have recently been received on profession of faith. Dr. Scott in a recent trip visited seventy-nine places where single Christians and families are dwelling in scattered villages, spending much time in searching out small villages and groups of peasant homes on the mountain sides where the name of Christ had never been heard."

GIPSY SMITH was conducting an evangelistic campaign in Chicago. Each noon the Great Northern Theater was filled within seven minutes of the time the doors were opened. Each day the gipsy evangelist was preceded by a Chicago preacher who took half the time. Men who had not been called evangelistic gave wonderful messages. Near the close of the week, after the people had listened to the most stirring appeal they had yet heard, Gipsy Smith came forward holding a bundle of letters in his hands. "These," he said, "are protests from some of you who think I ought to occupy all of this brief noon hour. Do you know why I have insisted on your own preacher dividing the time? First, because the Lord did not send me over here to commit suicide. Second, and chiefly, I wanted you to know that if you will support your own preachers as loyally and as enthusiastically as you do me, and as you have just supported this man, you will not have to send to England for a gipsy to preach the Gospel."

The Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.D.

IN dealing with that lingering survival of the ancient superstition of the "Sortes Biblicæ," the pietistic practice of lighting at random on verses of Scripture and accepting them as direct and personal messages from God without consideration of their proper significance, I remarked that "there is a law regulating the appropriation of the promises"; and I have since received numerous requests for a statement of that law.

IT is very simple. The initial fact is that the Holy Scriptures are not mystic oracles. They are the record of the revelation which God made of his character and will in his redemptive dealings with Israel, culminating in the Incarnation, his supreme and final self-manifestation. The Bible is not God's revelation; it is the history of his revelation, and it is only as it is viewed historically that the revelation is intelligible. Hence it is illegitimate to take an isolated sentence and regard it without more ado as a heavenly message, irrespective of the context and the original situation, after the archaic manner of theological controversialists who treated the Bible as an indiscriminate quarry of "proof-texts," which they hurled at each other regardless of the sacred writer's intention.

The need of every age and not least of our own is an understanding of the Scriptures and an unfolding of their living and eternal truth. This is the duty of preachers, if they would be "good stewards of the mysteries of God, rightly dividing the Word of truth." Here, then, is the law which regulates the appropriation of the promises, and a pointed exemplification of it is furnished by an incident in the life of Ambrose of Milan, the teacher and friend of Augustine. The emperor Theodosius had, in the heat of his passion, perpetrated a ghastly crime—the massacre of thousands of the citizens of Thessalonica,—and he presented himself at the church of Milan to participate in the celebration of the Holy Communion. Ambrose confronted him in the porch and debarred him until he should have purged his guilt. The emperor remonstrated and pleaded that, if he had committed bloodshed, so had King David, the man after God's heart. "You have imitated David in his sin," was the stern response; "imitate him in his repentance also."

Here is the law regulating the appropriation of the promises. They are nothing else than testimonies to God's dealings with faithful men in bygone generations; and, since his character is immutable, his grace is eternal, and when we know how he has dealt with others, we know how he will deal with us in like circumstances. This, however, is the essential condition: the circumstances must be identical. It is not sufficient that we should appeal to the Lord's promise to David and apply it to ourselves. The promise was made to David, and, since God's grace abides constant, to all who are in David's case; and therefore, ere we appropriate it, we must see to it that David's case is ours.

This is the fatal blunder of opening the Scriptures at random and taking the first verse that meets your eye as a message for you. That was the manner of the Jewish Cabbalists, and it is a dishonoring of God's Word to treat it as a magical talisman. The remedy lies in more earnest study and more intelligent apprehension of the historic revelation; and this is the supreme office of a preacher. He is a Christian teacher, and he owes it to his people to study the Word, that he may be able to interpret it to them. DAVID SMITH.

SCHOOL GARDENING. According to the Department of the Interior, 50,000 children in about 100 cities are this year cultivating back-yard gardens under school supervision, some of the children making as much as $150 from their gardens in one season.

FLEXIBILITY is the vital essential to the remarkable results which users are getting from Goodyear Cord Tires. It makes the tires resilient, fast, light-running, sturdy and strong.

Flexibility in the tire resists road injury. It enables the car to coast farther with the power shut off. It makes the motor's work easier in hill-climbing and in ordinary running.

It gives more comfort to the passengers in the car.

Because they accomplish these results, Goodyear Cord Tires have found first favor with thousands of motorists who count last cost more important than first cost.

Big satisfaction, low after-cost–

That's what you buy in a Haynes

Purchase price plus maintenance cost is the true price of any car. The light weight, the perfect balance and the smooth-going motor of the Haynes result in such upkeep economy, that on a purchase-price-plus-maintenance basis, this big, light car is really cheaper than many of lower price.

"America's Greatest 'Light Six'"

HAYNES

"America's Greatest 'Light Twelve'"

You know you'd get more satisfaction driving this beautiful, big car, with its Haynes sincerity of construction and its many-coated, lustrous finish. You know you'd get more comfort from its roomy body, its soft upholstery and its long springs.

You know you'd take very great enjoyment in the control of Haynes power—developed by a motor that yields more power than any other motor of any make of equal bore or stroke.

You'd thrill with sheer joy to beat the other fellow in the get-away, and pass him on the road—to throttle down on high to slower than a mile an hour, and to hit sixtv or sixty-five if the occasion required.

Why not get the complete satisfaction of driving the Haynes? YOU'LL PAY FOR HAYNES SATISFACTION WITHOUT GETTING IT if you buy a car a few hundred dollars cheaper, that will eat up the difference in price every season, in its excessive expense for gasoline and oil, and its wear and tear on tires.

Compared with cars of a similar price, the superiority of the Haynes is all the more apparent. No matter how much you have in mind paying for your car, investigate the combination of beauty, power, speed, durability and low up-keep in the Haynes. See the Haynes dealer for a real demonstration.

The Haynes all season Sedan, with removable panels illustrated above—is the height of luxury and comfort.

The new catalog gives you full opportunity to study the construction of America's Greatest "Light Six" and "Light Twelve." It's free on request.

Merry Moments

WHEN the Merry Moments column was started we announced that we could only return contributions when postage was enclosed. Some contributors, evidently forgetting this, have written inquiring as to the non-return of their contributions.

THE REASON WHY. A certain minister used to supply occasionally for a congregation which had no regular pastor. When he came he boarded around. He found a ready welcome, for he was genial and full of jokes. But somehow he usually seemed to leave the joke on some one else rather than on himself. Because of this, one hostess once approached with this question, "Dr. G—, can you tell me why it is that ministers' children are nearly always so bad?" "Well," the doctor replied meditatively, "I'm sure I don't know, Mrs. McA., unless it comes through association with the congregation."

HE HAD SEEN ONE. The little folks in the first grade were reading about a dandelion, and the teacher asked who had seen one.

Up went Ben's hand, and the teacher asked, "Where did you see a dandelion?"

"In a circus!" was the confident reply.

FOR FRYING ONLY. As a result of a partly completed correspondence course in advertising, Jerry Case painted on white card-board, and hung in front of his country store, the following:

"My eggs can't be beat!"

ONE ON THE SOLDIERS. A small boy astride of a donkey was taking some supplies to an army camp in Texas not long ago, and got there just as a detachment of soldiers, preceded by a band, was marching past.

The lad dismounted and held the bridle of the donkey tightly in his hand.

"Why are you holding on to your brother so hard?" asked a group of soldiers who were standing near and wanted to tease the country boy.

"I'm afraid he might enlist," said the lad, without batting an eyelash. — Chicago News.

A LUCKY CIRCUMSTANCE. "The wolves were upon us," he said, "bellowing and roaring, as I have so often heard them. We fled for our lives! I don't deny it; but every second we knew the ravenous pack was gaining on us. At last they were so near that we could feel their muzzles against our legs—"

"Ah!" gasped out the lady, who had been breathless throughout his tale of hairbreadth escapes. "How glad you must have been that they had their muzzles on!"—Answers.

GEORGE. George was our neighbor's boy. He lived about a block from us across a vacant lot, and was hardly out of bed before he wanted to "come over." Our buckwheat cakes and honey was one great attraction.

"Had your breakfast, George?" my father would say, cutting into the honey with one eye on the lad.

"Ye-es," the honest little fellow was forced to admit. "Yes, I had my brekfuss, but I jus' got hung-ry a-comin' over."

The Open-Air Church by the Sea

A GREAT religious outdoor work has been done this season at Brighton Beach, Coney Island, where 174,719 persons have been reached with the Gospel, 136 have accepted Christ, and hundreds have earnestly asked to be prayed for. The Brighton Beach Gospel work, conducted by a corps of believers from different Brooklyn churches, was inaugurated five years ago to reach non-churchgoers, pleasure-seekers, the worldly-minded, the ungodly and the profane. Mr. W. E. Stephens, a business man, is director of the work. Each year it has grown in interest, attendance and practical results. The meetings are conducted just off the Boardwalk at Brighton Beach and are held on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, between five and seven P.M. In the first year there were about 60,000 persons reached; the second year, 133,450; the third year, 212,850; the fourth year, 170,688; and this season, up to this date, 174,719—a total of 751,707 to date. The figures for the last four years are an actual count.

The open-air services consist of singing, Scripture exposition and short Gospel talks. At the close, each personal worker seeks out an individual inquirer and confession cards are signed and sent to the churches near which the converts reside.

The work is independent and undenominational, and is supported by free-will offerings. The proportionate cost of expenditures for the total number of auditors reached at the services is three-tenths of one cent per capita.

Questions and Answers

C. W. D., Milwaukee, Wis. 1. In Heb. 1:14, we read "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Please explain. 2. Do you think, and if so, have you any Scriptural basis to show, that our Christian loved ones minister to us, who are disciples of Christ, after they have gone to the homeland? My dear companion has been called home. I am alone in the world now. Sometimes I think I feel her spirit's influence in my lonely hours. God is my constant Companion, and talks with me and walks with me in these hours. And yet I seem to feel another influence. Ought I to attribute it to her who is gone before?

1. The passage in Heb. 1:14 is to be read in its relation to verse 7, same chapter. Both verses relate to the ministry of angels, and the work they perform in obedience to the divine will, the performance of which is likened to the wind and lightning in swiftness, and also to the flaming fire. Their ministry for those who shall be heirs of salvation is, in the primary sense, a ministry rendered not to men, who have no power or authority over them, but to God and for men, since it is directed to the good of men. 2. What we know regarding the state of those dear redeemed ones who have passed on before us, is sufficient to assure us of their well-being and of their future happiness. The presence of Moses and Elijah upon the Transfiguration Mount, the parable of the rich man and Lazarus and other passages have been adduced as evidence that the righteous dead still have a spiritual interest in the welfare of their friends on earth. The famous figure of "a cloud of witnesses" (employed by Paul in Heb. 12:1) is strong presumptive evidence that in apostolic days the belief was general in the Church that the departed saints were privileged to know how the great moral contest is progressing in the world—a struggle in which they themselves were once engaged. That spiritual life is continuous and unbroken, that the righteous at death simply step across the threshold into a life that is higher and fuller than that on earth, that their spirits beckon us with cheer and encouragement—these are thoughts that are very dear to the hearts of God's people, even though they may be beyond human demonstration. God in his infinite wisdom has seen fit to veil the future from our intrusive gaze. There are many things which we cannot comprehend and could not bear if we did, but which will be made plain to us hereafter. But on the one point of the interest of the heavenly inhabitants in us, we may feel assured that if there is joy in heaven over the finding of one lost sheep—over one sinner that repenteth, as Jesus himself declared (Luke 15:10)—that joy will be shared by the redeemed, our own dear ones among them.

Mrs. M. C., Herrin, Ill., also "Troubled," Philadelphia, Pa. 1. Do not worry about the fate of your children who died unbaptized. He that said "Suffer little children to come unto me," (Luke 18:16; Matt. 19:14; Mark 10:14) meant exactly what this passage portends, namely, that he wants little children to come to him. If they are with him, do you not think they are safe? 2. We cannot explain dreams. Scientists have endeavored to do so for centuries and have not succeeded. Do not allow your dreams either to worry or to elate you. Until we know more about their origin we should attach no significance to our dreams. 3. In I Cor. 7:14 the apostle means this: whereas the fact that a husband has a Christian wife will not save him, yet by having a Christian wife, he has all the influences of a Christian wife around him, and the opportunity to be attracted by her Christlike demeanor and actions. This may lead the husband to him who produces this character and attitude, and thus to salvation and sanctification.

J. S., Middleton, Mich. Please explain Matt. 24:26.

The passage refers to the days of tribulation which are to come in the last times, and is a warning against being deceived by false teachers who claim superior knowledge of the Lord and his whereabouts, as, for instance, in the wilderness, in the inner chamber, teaching in private, proposing some scheme of deliverance. Reading verse 27, we understand this caution to refer to all teachers who assert that the kingdom of heaven is in a given locality, and who set forth some man-made conception of the second advent. The caution then is against superstition, enthusiasm and fanaticism in the days of the waiting church.

W. D. L., Shreveport, La. Was Judas at the Supper and were his feet washed by Christ along with those of the other disciples?

The four evangelists are entirely independent in their account of the Last Supper. Luke 22:15–18 records the expression of our Lord's desire to eat the passover with them. The washing of the disciples' feet is mentioned by John only (13:4–12) and this precedes the announcement of the betrayer, "And ye are clean, but not all" (John 13:10) and "Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me" (Matt 26:21). According then to this, Judas was at the supper and had his feet washed and thus a new opportunity for repentance.

Mrs. H., Compron, Quebec. What is meant by "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"? Who is my neighbor?

The lesson taught in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30), answers your two questions. The lesson is one of philanthropy manifesting itself in humane, self-sacrificing acts to all in need, irrespective of all other human distinctions. In the highest sense, our Lord alone has perfectly set forth the character of the Good Samaritan, which we are to emulate. When and where you find one in need either physical or spiritual, there is indicated a "neighbor"; and just as much as you wish to have done for yourself under like conditions, that done for the needy one would be loving him as yourself.

F. F., Reading, Pa. There are sixteen bronze statues set along the balustrade of the galleries in the rotunda of the Library of Congress, the statues being arranged in pairs, each pair flanking one of the eight great pillars. The statues were chosen to represent illustrious men who were typical representatives of human development and civilization, and the list of names with their classification is as follows: Religion, Moses and St. Paul; History, Herodotus and Gibbon; Art, Michael Angelo and Beethoven; Commerce, Columbus and Robert Fulton; Philosophy, Plato and Lord Bacon; Poetry, Homer and Shakespeare; Law, Solon and Chancellor Kent; Science, Newton and Professor Joseph Henry.

THE LITTLE SUFFERER

*By W. Livingston Larned

POOR little chap! They've taken you
And twisted up a leg or so.
Back home once more, and smiling, too,
But how? That's what I want to know.
What sweet thought, rooted in the dark,
Should hold you to the brighter way?
For that grim hand has left its mark,
And brought you limping back today.

Poor little chap! my memory
Of you is linked with happiness;
Of romping feet that seemed to me
To tread on air, or clouds, I guess.
A pink-cheeked, noisy little chap,
Who, when he saw me at the gate,
Would race like mad into my lap
For fear his kisses were too late.

Poor little chap! We'll hide away
The tennis racquet and the skates;
We'll find some other games to play,
And cry, "My lord, th' carriage waits."
Wheeled round the garden's flowery loom
Where dreams are spun and hopes made new,
My heart, somehow, has extra room
To hold the crippled form of you.

Poor little chap!—but is it "poor"?
I doubt the wisdom of my words;
For all the pain that you endure,
Your heart is somewhat like a bird's.
You sing and laugh and say your prayers,
Just as you used to do before,
Whilst I—grief-stricken, on the stairs—
Half say that I will pray no more.

FAIR little chap, from whose clear eyes
God's patience looks into my own,
You, in your baby way, are wise,
And Daddy seems to drift alone.
The blight has never touched your heart,
Nor withered little lips that pray.
Who knows? Perhaps it is your part
To bring me back my faith today.

H. W. Roth, Greenville, Pa., writes: "The dear old evening prayer, 'Now I lay me down to sleep,' that Mother taught us long ago is fastened deeply in many a heart. Some of your readers have asked for a little prayer of like character for the morning. There have been submitted several such prayers for the children and even for those of older growth. Based upon the old evening prayer, may I venture to send you this:

MORNING PRAYER

Now, O Lord, I wake from sleep;
Thou my soul didst safely keep;
Guard me, Lord, the coming day,
Teach me what to do and say.
And this for Jesus' sake I pray. Amen.

The Codex Alexandrinus (now in the British Mus m) one of the oldest Bible manuscripts in existence. All that we know of heaven, through revelation and pira tion, gives the impression of a state of continuous act ty a well as of rest. Activity involves progress always. ccus tomed in the mortal life to measure all events by our s dar of time, we cannot transplant ourselves, even in imag tion to a condition in which time is unknown and where ern progression rules. In the Scriptures, heaven is v ousl described as a kingdom, a country, a city, a home, a ace— terms comprehensible to human minds. It is muc nore which we cannot comprehend now. It is impossible con ceive of living forever in heaven without progress, hou new ideas, new and finer impressions, and new expe nces all of which are contributory to development. As a e o earth grows up to childhood and to manhood, so the be h heaven develops in the spirit life, under auspices that re al favorable to such progress. Further, as in this life o earth various degrees of capacity and talent have been assi ed t different individuals, it is reasonable to believe that the future life there will be variety of capacity and empl nent and that the divine wisdom will afford, in a far large egre than we can now realize, opportunities for the devel men of knowledge and capacity which are so imperfe here (See I Cor. 13 : 10.) In our conceptions of heaven, it ctivi ties and enjoyments, we must not forget that our i s ar necessarily imperfect. (See I Cor. 2 : 9.) In that d eternal youth we shall meet and know our loved ones It inconceivable that, in a state of perpetual progres there should be no change in them. Rather we should beli tha in that glorified state, when they come to meet and g t us we shall find them dearer, sweeter, lovelier since their a ptior into the great family of heaven. There we shall f ou children—who were ours to keep here on earth but a litt whil —our children still, though in the development that is n onge measured by the years they may have attained the ature of the angels.

Old Subscriber, Selma, Miss. Your experience is y no means an isolated instance. Through God's goodn you have been led to repent of your sins, you have accepte hrist as your Saviour and have forsaken the old sinful lif You asked God that the sins of the past be forgiven for the ke ol his dear Son. God never turned a deaf ear to such a ayer when made from a heart truly penitent. Do you do t his acceptance and forgiveness? We have the positive as ance that whosoever will may come and be cleansed and pa ned; and again, "Whosoever cometh unto me, I will in wise cast out." It is not a sign of faith, but rather of the nt ol it, to keep on mourning over the past, and to implor gain and again forgiveness for what was settled long ago You must pray for faith in the divine assurance of forg ness. Yet even remorse is discipline, and we should bear it u l. by God's grace, we come to a happier state of mind; but it ould spur us on to do the works meet for repentance. Yo peak of restitution as now being an impossibility in you case. Not so. There is a conscience fund in Christian exp ence and when restitution is humanly impossible, on accoun f the lapse of years or the death of those interested, it is st open to us to devote to the Lord's work the equivalent of w t we would have restored had it been possible. Regener on is the work of the Holy Spirit in changing the heart. P y for a new heart, a will to serve and an opportunity. Yc have tortured yourself long enough by doubts; doubt him no ger. He is able to save to the uttermost—and he will. Ta him at his word and live on that plane hereafter. Praye the strongest weapon in the Christian's armory, and you v find it so if you believe while you pray, for prayer witho aith is unavailing. There are great multitudes of Christi men and women in America who can vouch for the efficacy of yer. They pray strong in faith, and then when their pray are answered, they give God the glory. Further, mak your Christianity active, vital, hearty—the biggest part your life. Confess Christ at every fitting opportunity and y will find it a means of strength and blessing (see Luke 1 : 8). If you can associate yourself with some form of p tical Christian work in your city and cultivate the acqua ance of those similarly engaged, you will find in such work s any opportunities for helping others that your troubles w soon be forgotten, and your faith will increase with eve new experience.

America to Save a Whole People

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

A PROCLAMATION

WHEREAS, I have received from the Senate of the United States a Resolution, passed July 7, 1916, reading as follows:

> "Resolved, That, appreciating the sufferings of the Syrian people, it is suggested that the President of the United States set aside a day upon which a direct appeal to the sympathy of all American citizens shall be made and an opportunity shall be given for our public-spirited people to contribute to a much-needed fund for the relief of the Syrian people."

And Whereas, a Resolution was passed by the Congress of the United States on July 18, 1916, reading as follows:

> "Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in view of the misery, wretchedness and hardships, which these people are suffering, the President of the United States be respectfully asked to designate a day on which the citizens of this country may give expression to their sympathy by contributing to the funds now being raised for the relief of the Armenians in the belligerent countries."

And Whereas, I feel confident that the people of the United States will be moved to aid these peoples stricken by war, famine and disease:

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, in compliance with the said suggestion of the Senate, and the said request of the Congress thereof; do appoint and proclaim Saturday, October 21, and Sunday, October 22, 1916, as joint days upon which the people of the United States may make such contributions as they feel disposed for the aid of the stricken Syrian and Armenian peoples.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Woodrow Wilson

By the President;
ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

Save such as these from the fate of those shown in the picture below

THE government at Washington has been stirred to action of a most unusual character by conditior n an ancient corner of the civi ed world. Upon the reque and authority of Congress, the esident has appointed two day n October upon which the Am can people are urged to thi of another people who are faci extinction. America is urg to save from annihilation the ighest-cultured people of the Ottoman Empire, wh is the oldest national Ch tian church in the world, the rmenians. Taking occasio f the entrance of the war int Turkish territory, Islam as ented its age-long hatred of C istianity upon this people, wh ave ever refused to bow to Mo mmed. The Armenians fro the beginning have been the orld's martyr race.

A l now the condition of the people has become so appal gly terrible, their helplessnes o complete and their need o st, that nothing short of a s ultaneous movement thr ghout the entire United Sta s for their relief can avail. In uch a movement the Pres de has officially endorsed to tak place on Saturday, October l, nd Sunday, October 22. Th days should be memorable in history of our country for the pontaneous outpouring of gifts by the American e e for the preservation of a whole race in another an.

e Armenians are like all other people in their love of e, and they hope on and struggle on through lo s that would seem to blot out every star of hope an very prospect of better days to come. There wo l not seem to be much encouragement to live thr gh the night, to women who have gotten through the ay by gnawing the bones of a street dog. Redu l to eat grass for food, who would not give up an hoose to enter upon an endless sleep! Why sh d a mother, after being three days without food, all at time carrying in her arms a starving babe wh ad at last died there, cling to life? But they do cli to life. Somehow they still hope for a brighter to rrow. Somehow they cannot believe that all the orld has turned against them.

is a fact of great significance that Ch tian America is now known as the fri l of the afflicted, and wherever cal ity falls, hope instantly turns to rd this great country of ours and cli s there.

S ALL that hope be disappointed ow? There are some among these hu reds of thousands of homeless wa erers in whom hope dies. Mothers ha cast themselves after the dead bo s of their babes into the streams. Fa ers have refused to survive the pit l deaths of their families. How ma more must go that road out of th misery?

uly it is not for any one to ask w little innocent babies and chil dr should be saved from the fate that is reatening them; nor why mothers an fathers, who seem to have abso lut y nothing to live for save to watch th children die, should be assisted to ve on from day to day. A short tir ago in this country an outburst of opular indignation greeted the ac f a physician who refused to prese the life of a new-born baby that w so defective in every way as to pr ude any possibility of its ever being either physically or mentally a normal being. So precious, then, is that wonderful thing called life. And over in Syria men, women and children who are in every respect normal, who have been useful and prosperous and ambitious and orderly in their behavior, are being starved to death and beaten to death and most untellably tortured to death.

These things are so.

The evidence cannot be questioned. The eye-witnesses who have reported conditions are trustworthy. The testimony that has been gathered by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief is overwhelming. This committee is composed of men who are noted for sanity and public spiritedness. So great is the suffering, so complete the destruction of homes and crops, so fearful the atrocities, that we in America are apt to exclaim, "Impossible!"

But the thing is so.

It is true that no longer are heads of households being driven outside their villages to be killed with clubs and axes. Men, women and children by the thousands are not still being driven aboard boats to be made targets of artillery. Just now, it may be, there is some respite to the womanhood, young and old, of Armenia from the supreme brutality of men. It is not from such terrors that America is asked to deliver these people. It is from the grim aftermath of homelessness, foodlessness, helplessness.

IT must be remembered that these people are not so much innocent victims of the war as innocent victims of religious fanaticism. The war is in large measure responsible, it is true, but Islam's undying hatred of this Christian people has made the most of the wild hour in Europe to work its fury. Every impulse of justice as well as of pity that America is capable of should wake at the tale of Armenia's sufferings. The leadership of the President in this cause should have unanimous following. Foremost in responding to this appeal should be the followers of Jesus Christ. Indeed, the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, while looking to the whole nation, is making an especial appeal through the churches of the land.

The first result of the President's proclamation is the gift of $10,000 made by Christian Herald readers and transferred from the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War to the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief. This gift is supplemental to an earlier one of $5,000 to the same Committee, a total of $15,000 now contributed in this field.

We gladly place the situation anew before our readers. As a great Christian family we are able to give worthily to such a cause. We are closing the harvest season, and, as a nation, we shall soon devote a day to Thanksgiving. We know each for himself what blessings the year has brought. We know indeed that to none of us has come such adversity as these thousands of families endure in Armenia today. In all the history of Christian Herald charities you have not had a greater opportunity than this to relieve suffering. You have made your name known throughout the whole world for your benevolences. Your gifts to charity wherever they go bear the name of Christ, for they are characterized by that word "Christian."

Let us, then, be in the forefront at this time. In response to the President's proclamation, send in your gifts with the utmost liberality, make this a part of your Sunday worship. Read the article on page 1154 and consider what it may be your privilege to do to wipe out the deep stain of national gain through the war, by a great national gift to the innocent sufferers of that war.

We ask that you send your own gifts and urge upon your friends, your church congregation, your Sunday schools, to send gifts. We shall make acknowledgment by name and amount in the Christian Herald in due course. Indicate if all or a part of your gift is intended for the Armenian people, and your wishes will be strictly observed.

What the Cross Means to Me

A Communion Day Sermon

BY REV. CHARLES C. ALBERTSON, D.D.

TEXT—Galatians 6 : 14. "God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross."

The Rev. Charl Carroll Albertson, D.D is the pastor of the La fayette Avenue Pres byterian Church c Brooklyn, to whic congregation Dr. Theo dore Ledyard Cuyle ministered for thirt years. This churc has a membership c more than two thou sand, and supports tw prosperous chapels.

IT is a remarkable fact, of which many are not aware, that nearly one-third of the four Gospels is devoted to accounts of the death of Christ, the incidents leading up to it and following it. Some writer has reminded us that the other two-thirds of the four Gospels are given up to a preparation for the account of Christ's death. This is remarkable, but entirely capable of proof. It will surprise many who make little of the Cross to confront this fact. It will effectively rebuke those who hold that the church has given too large a place in its preaching to the Cross. If the men who gave us the record of Jesus' life thought his death was an event of such importance as to justify giving it so large a proportion of their attention, is it not possible that we have erred in understating the comparative importance of the Cross?

The same writer who calls our attention to the fact that so much of the Gospels is given to the death of Christ, and so much to events leading up to that death, calls our attention to the fact that the death of Paul has no such an important place in the New Testament. There is no specific mention of the event in all the New Testament. Why is this so? Doubtless because it never occurred to anybody that the death of Paul was an event of supreme importance to the faith of the Christian world. His life was important. He had a great part in the founding of the Christian Church. He has been the teacher of Christians in all ages. But he died as others have died, and no one knows absolutely the manner or the place of his burial. Doubtless his dust mingles with the dust of Rome, hidden beneath the débris of eighteen centuries. Sacred dust is that, mingled with the blood of so many martyrs. But the death of Paul had no theological significance to the Christians of his age, and has none to us.

THE death of Christ, however, is an event regarded by all the writers of the New Testament as of such transcending importance that to omit reference to it would be to leave the Christian system of doctrine an unfinished building, a temple without a roof. Paul and James may have had differences of opinion on other things, but they did not differ on this. Peter thinks very differently from John on many subjects, but they agree on this. The apostles change their minds on some subjects as they grow older. Paul reverses himself on more than one point. But not one of the apostles ever varies by so much as a hair's breadth from the first until the last on this point, that the Cross is the central figure in the Christian theology; that Christ crucified is the object of all Christian preaching; and that without the blood of Christ, without the doctrine of his sacrificial death, the whole system of Christian theology is without meaning and power.

What does the Cross stand for in our thinking? First of all it stands for the utmost effort on the part of God to bridge the chasm between himself and errant man. What more could the prodigal's father have done than he did when he ran to meet the ragged, footsore wanderer before he reached the gate of home? The Cross is where God meets the penitent long before he reaches home. The attitude of God toward the sinner, the temper of God toward the man who has fallen and failed, is revealed in the Cross as nowhere else. That there is welcome for the sinner, and that the heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind, the Cross proclaims as nothing else.

THERE is the story of the king many of whose subjects rebelled against him. He might have crushed them, but he was a magnanimous monarch, who preferred to win them. So he appointed an envoy to confer with them, offering amnesty to such as conformed to reasonable requirements, and appointed a day and a place for them to come to him, relate the story of their wrongs as they conceived them, promising that if their complaints were well founded their wrongs should be redressed. The meeting-place was at a distance from the king's palace and under the spreading branches of an ancient oak. The rebels came and were received by the king himself. They stated their grievances, which the king himself guaranteed should be redressed; and each rebel, putting his hands between the king's hands, swore to be his faithful man thereafter.

The parallel is not exact. We have no complaints against God. He has not wronged us nor oppressed us. Yet we are rebels, and he invites us to return and be reconciled to him. Now what is the Cross? The Cross is the spreading tree under which the King of heaven meets his rebel subjects and receives them with open arms and pitying heart.

A Housekeeper's Prayer

"FATHER, I thank thee for the measure of peace thou didst give amid this day's distractions. I thank thee for strength of brain and body to meet its demands. I thank thee for the times when an upward lift of heart to thee was possible; for the kind words vouchsafed me out of thy patience when mine would have failed. Forgive me that I was not more peaceful, more prayerful, more considerate of others. Let today's failures teach me to depend more upon thee, who dost never fail. I thank thee for night and rest; for shelter and safety. Be with those whose rest is disturbed or prevented by pain or poverty. Especially comfort the war-sufferers; bless all means used to alleviate physical suffering; grant thy richest blessing to workers in camp and hospital, who are teaching the soldiers of the Prince of Peace. Hasten the day of his coming to reign!

"Bless the little children thou hast given me to love. Since thou dost know and love all children, let not thy giving be limited by my asking, but thy grace be upon all. May any who have this day gone wrong, whether wilfully or unconsciously, be led back, pardoned and cleansed, ere they sleep. Keep them from evil, for Christ's sake. Amen."

THERE once came to me a young man who had run away from home. He was too proud to ask to be taken back. His father was too proud to ask him to come back. The boy said, "I would be glad to go back if only the way were open." Well, the way was opened presently by personal intercession, and the runaway boy was restored to his father's arms and his mother's heart. Does any one of us say, "I would be glad to go back home to God, if only the way were open?" The Cross is the way home!

The mother whose son went to sea and was not heard of for years still be vec him to be alive. And, lest he return at nigl anc have difficulty in getting in, she left a lamp urning and a window-shade drawn up. Upo this incident was based the song you may have l ard. "There's a Light in the Window for T ee." What is the Cross? It is the light in the w low of heaven to tell the mariner on the seas o ime that the door is not locked, and that the w y to reinstatement in the Father's love is open ide.

BUT there is a human aspect and a h nan application to the doctrine of the oss. The Cross marks the supreme hour of self-surrender in the life of our Lord. It is not ithout meaning that he himself, long before h rod the path to Calvary, spoke of his dis les' cross-bearing. "If any man would be my sciple, let him take up his cross." That s nds strange, coming as it does so long befor the tragedy of Golgotha. The Cross of Christ rks that event in the life of Jesus which must ha its parallel in our lives if we would be his dis les. There must be an offering up of life. ere must be an inward crucifixion. Personal ride must be slain and personal passion must l deposed. This is what Paul meant when he oke of being crucified to the world. The me val mystics spoke of a certain religious expe nce as "inward death." This, in effect, is wha onversion is. We die to some things and be to live to others. The principle of self-sa fice becomes regnant in our lives from the in ant of our choice of Christ. So the Cross i the badge of Christian discipleship and Chr ian service. Do you wear the cross as a ch m? It must be worn more deeply. It must be orn where a soldier of Napoleon declared hi mperor's name was worn, within the art itself.

JESUS laid down his life at the Cross, b he finds his life again in the lives of all who follow him. Whatever we sacrifice when w enter his discipleship, we find again on eart nd in heaven. There came into a country di ict not long ago a demonstrator of a remar ble machine. In the market-place of a village ere the country people gathered on a holida he set up his machine and asked for common tal objects, articles of iron or brass, or even in. He took them and immersed them in the ver bath and presently restored them to eir owners transfigured at least exteriorly, cha ged âs to their nature.

At the Cross of Christ by faith we who eld our lives as common instruments of Chri ian service discover a similar metamorphosis, et not confined to the surface, for it penet tes throughout. We give him clay and get ck iron. We give him iron and get back ss. We give him brass and get back silver. We ive him silver, and gold is our reward. Gol we offer, and lo! eternal life is ours.

Our Headquarters

SUNDAY, October 22. Phil. 3 : 20. "Our citizenship is in heaven." Everything depends on where we make our headquarters. The entire disposition of my life is determined by my [illegible]s. My point of outlook will settle the character of my outlook, and will shape my conceptions of everything. My business matters, my political interests, my social fellowships, and the range and value of my religious faith will all be appointed in accordance with the accepted ideal of my supreme relation.

To what do I primarily belong? Where is the home of my soul? Where has my citizenship its birth, and from whence does it derive its highest sanctities and sanctions? And here is the holy claim and boast of the apostle Paul, that his citizenship is in heaven. He is a citizen of Rome, but this minor citizenship is merged in the higher, whose authority is commanding, whose purpose is universal, and whose franchise and prerogatives surpass our largest dreams.

When our citizenship is in heaven it gives altitude to our practical life. It lifts us above the locality in which we live, not in aloofness, or in selfish detachment, for the peoples of heavenly citizenship have always been the most neighborly folk in the street. It is just because their spiritual headquarters is in heaven, and that they live in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus that they are competent to help and lift their fellow-men. We cannot lift folk above our own level any more than water can rise above its source. In this matter of raising our fellows, our dynamic is in precise proportion to our height. It is only as we are related to heaven that we can vitally minister to the earth. If the citizenship in New York or in London is to be enriched and purified, it is only going to be accomplished by those whose citizenship is in heaven. The "Jerusalem that is" is to be transformed by the "Jerusalem which is from above."

And when our citizenship is in heaven it gives breadth to all our practical life. Paul's heavenly citizenship made him a citizen of the world. When a man's headquarters are in heaven, he has fraternal ties with the race. And surely I am no worse a neighbor because I live high enough to see the man in the next street! And surely I am no worse a Methodist because I live high enough to see the Baptist farm as well and the fields where the Episcopalians are at work! And certainly I am no worse an Englishman because I live high enough to see the Jew, and the American, and the Irishman, and the Hindoo! Convictions need not become thin just because they become broad. Emotions need not be narrow in order to be deep. The apostle Paul lived high enough to see that in Christ Jesus there was neither Greek nor Jew; at his noble height these two farms were lost in a common landscape. Paul's citizenship had the height of the heavens, and it consequently had the breadth of the earth. J. H. J.

Seeking to Know God's Will

MONDAY, October 23. II Sam. 5 : 17-25. "David inquired of the Lord." Six times over in David's life-story we meet this phrase. After our most careful consideration of the course to be pursued in the greater or less crises of life, we often find ourselves unable to decide how to act. In such an hour, we cannot do better than remember the instructions given by Moses concerning Joshua, which also governed this action of David: "He shall stand before the priest, who shall inquire for him by the judgment of the Urim before the Lord. At his word shall they go out, and at his word they shall come in." For us also there is the diamond crystal, which shines with the Divine Yes and dims with No. Our Urim and Thummim is the conviction wrought by the Spirit of God on the pure and sensitive heart, after prayer for direction.

Each day brings its own conflict. Hardly has one passed before another awaits us. Success in former attacks does not ensure the like in that which we may experience today or tomorrow; and therefore each new ordeal requires fresh humility, watchfulness, and prayer. King Alfred's motto was: "If today thou be conqueror, beware of the fight of tomorrow; and if today thou be conquered, prepare for the fight of tomorrow." David inquired of the Lord again.

We must not make war against the adversary with the human weapons of our own wisdom and strength, but in reliance on the going forth of the Lord on our behalf. Let us listen for "the sound of marching," like the rustling of the leaves of trees when a fresh breeze springs up during or after a day of absolute stillness, when for hours not a leaf has quivered. For David only that sign was reserved. The man who had prayed was the man who heard. It was the sound of the stepping of legions of angels, who were marching to battle against the enemy. "Then bestir thyself." There is time for acting as well as for praying and waiting! F. B. M.

The Grace of Humor

TUESDAY, October 24. Ps. 126 : 2. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing." Mr. Arthur C. Benson, whose religious strain comes out in all his writings, said: "I have often felt, myself, that the time has come to raise another figure to the hierarchy of Christian graces. Faith, Hope and Charity were sufficient in a more elementary and barbarous age; but, now that the world has broadened somewhat, I think an addition to the trio is demanded. A man may be faithful, hopeful and charitable, and yet leave much to be desired. The fourth quality that I should like to see raised to the highest rank among Christian graces is the grace of Good Humor."

In speaking with Dr. McPherson, head-master of Lawrenceville School, a few years ago, I asked what characteristics he looked for in choosing teachers for his school. He answered: "First, the sense of humor; no man can live successfully in close quarters with students without a keen perception of the humorous." By this, the head-master doubtless referred to that saving sense of proportion that appreciates incongruities, saves a man from priggishness and undue superiority, and prevents his solemnity and earnestness from being a troublesome burden to those about him.

For my own part I have never been able to imagine the Christ clad in those dreary garments of overwhelming seriousness which some of his followers have donned. He who was found at weddings and at feasts, the Lord of forgiveness and humanity, wanted not, I believe, that element that lies deep in our human nature—the Kindly Grace of Humor. C. S. C.

Appropriating the Promises

WEDNESDAY, October 25. II Sam. 7 : 18-29. "Confirm thou it for ever and do as thou hast spoken." David quotes the divine promise as a reason for his prayer. He intimates that otherwise he would not have found it in his heart to do so. In like manner the ten thousand promises of Scripture should incite and encourage us to pray for bestowments, which we would not have otherwise ventured to ask for. For though the promises have been made, God waits for us to appropriate them, to place the finger of faith upon them, and say "Do as thou hast said." This is the essence of effective prayer. There are many petitions in prayer which emanate from our selfhood in one form or another, and the answer to which cannot be guaranteed. But directly we discover a promise which precisely meets our case, we can take our stand on it with an assurance that God is pledged to fulfil it.

What God has said includes all that we really need, but no more than we need for our highest blessedness. Let us not be content with less. Let us study the promises, stretch our minds to grasp them, and then turn them into prayer; and since it is hardly likely that our thoughts have attained to the full extent of their meaning, let us yield ourselves to the influences of the Holy Spirit, that he may intercede within and for us with inexpressible desire. God is bound by his words! As David Livingstone put it: "My Father is a perfect gentleman"; meaning, of course, that God's word is his bond. "Hath God said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?" Familiarize yourself with God's promises. There is one exactly suited to every need. Then claim them! F. B. Gifts That Count

THURSDAY, October 26. Luke 21 : 3. "Of a truth I say unto you, this poor widow hath cast in more than they all." We often hesitate to make gifts to our friends because we are not able to make expensive ones. We say "they have everything. There is nothing I can give which will add to their happiness." We forget that it is often the smallest token, charged with the spirit of real love, that most deeply impresses us. Jesus said of the widow that her small gift was more than the total of all the others.

In our camp in the country among the hills of Pennsylvania, just across the road lives a farmer whose fine, generous-hearted wife has only once in her life been to New York, and whose advantages of education or whose means would seem to make the value of her gifts almost useless. Yet we have seldom been more deeply impressed with the love behind a gift than when, on baking days, some one of the numerous little brood is seen coming down the path with a platter of cookies or of fresh, crisp doughnuts, and with a shy little remark: "Mother sent you these with her love."

As the ministry of Christ could be summarized under the word "giving," so the deep and abiding impression of most of our lives depends upon what and how we render our gifts to others. The important question is, "Do we give ourselves with our gift?"

> The Holy Supper is kept, indeed,
> In whatso we share with another's need;
> Not what we give, but what we share,
> For the gift without the giver is bare;
> Who gives himself, with his alms feeds three:
> Himself, his hungering neighbor, and Me.

Deliverance from the Guilt of Sin

FRIDAY, October 27. Ps. 51 : 1-19. "Have mercy upon me, O God." A whole year had passed since David's great crime, during which he had sullenly hardened himself against God and all the remonstrances of conscience. But day and night, God's hand was heavy upon him, till it must have been relief when Nathan suddenly broke in on him with "Thou art the man." Then followed an agony of remorse, repentance, forgiveness, and punishment in the death of the child. It was after all these events that the royal penitent poured out this prayer before God.

Here is a threefold view of sin. It is transgression, in which the perverted will sets itself against lawful authority; iniquity, which means what is twisted and bent; sin, which literally signifies missing the mark. But the psalmist believes in forgiveness. He asks that God would absolutely erase the long gloomy indictment that sin had written, so that the page of life might be fair and unsoiled. He asks that the robe or habit of his soul—or, as we say, the character—might be washed and cleansed from its splashes and stains. He asks that he might be cleansed, which denotes the priestly act of declaring ceremonial cleanness, such as the declaring and making clean the leper who had been excommunicated from the sanctuary.

His plea is the multitude of God's tender mercies. God's revealed character, his faithfulness and patience in combating evil, his love in Christ Jesus—these are the arguments of the penitent soul. But David goes on to plead that, great transgressor as he has been, he may henceforth become a saint. He asks for a right spirit, a free spirit, thy Holy Spirit. He claims absolute freedom and exemption from the past. "Then," he says, "I shall be free." Nothing that God can give seems too much for the restored penitent to ask—thy Spirit, thy presence, the joy of thy salvation! Ask what thou wilt; thou honorest God by great claims on his grace! F. B. Peace Through Tribulation SATURDAY, October 28. II Cor. 1 : 8. "We were pressed out of measure." In mechanics, pressure produces power. When the iron of the gun and the boiler of the engine are strong to resist pressure, the power becomes tremendous. The utilization of pressure is one of the greatest miracles the human mind has produced, and furnishes an analogy of the development of power in supernatural realms. In business life, riches lets up on the pressure and, ease taking the place of activity, the business genius disintegrates. Christ says, "In the world ye shall have tribulation; in me ye shall have peace. For tribulation worketh patience"; that is, produces a pressure upon the soul which only the strength of divine power can enable man to successfully overcome.

The apostle Paul took pleasure in this tremendous pressure. He knew that grace was sufficient to sustain him, and that trial brought him closer to the soul of his Master. Outward pressure of circumstances increased the inward loving pressure upon his heart.

It is another wonderful fact that the equilibrium produced by high pressure and the resistance of divine power brings not turbulence but peace. Tribulation does not trouble, because the soul is tranquil as God. We are more than conquerors even before the battle is fought, and victory is as certain as the strength of Christ, which enables us to do all things.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

Submarine Attacks Off Our Coast

Between 6 A.M. and 10 A.M., Sunday, October 8, the German U-boat No. 53, which had created a sensation by putting in at Newport, R. I., the day before, presumably to deliver a note for Ambassador von Bernstorff, and had departed three hours later after permitting visitors to look her over, began a drastic holdup of shipping off Nantucket, R. I. Three British freighters, one coastwise British liner, a Dutch freighter and a Norwegian freighter, were halted and sunk, the crew in every case, and the passengers from the liner, including several Americans, escaping in small boats. An American steamer, the Kansan, bound from New York to Genoa loaded with steel for the Italian government, was halted, but allowed to proceed upon establishing her nationality.

The identity of the attacking submarine or submarines was not known at the time of going to press; but it is presumed the U53 was in the action. The news of the attacks was made known through wireless calls for help. The United States flotilla of destroyers at Newport, 17 in number, raced to pick up survivors, and the earliest reports indicate, as stated, that all were saved.

A sensation was created by the reports of the submarine activities. The first effect was a practically universal order to hold the shipping of allied countries in port. The International Mercantile Marine sent telegrams to its agents in Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Portland and Montreal, to hold all British vessels until further orders. This ties up the White Star, Atlantic Transport, Leyland, Dominion, and Red Star lines from American ports, and the White Star Dominion from Canada. The Cunard liners are armed with four-inch rapid-fire guns, and an official is quoted as saying these vessels might not alter their sailings. French and Italian liners also, being armed, are said to be likely to continue on schedule. American ships are not affected.

England and her allies maintain a patrol fleet on this side of the water, but the press could obtain no news concerning the fleet's whereabouts or what steps would be taken to defeat further attacks by submarines.

At this writing it is impossible to do more than chronicle the event itself. Other neutral and allied ships are approaching this shore and wireless warnings have been sent to them. Ambassador and Mrs. Gerard are on board the Scandinavian-American Frederick VIII.

Danish Parliament Would Sell. On September 30 both houses of the Danish parliament passed a bill providing for a plebiscite on the question of the proposed sale to the United States of the Danish West Indies. The proposition as it will come before the people of Denmark before the end of November will, it is said, include the Faroe Islands, but not Iceland or Greenland. The premier urged immediate action on the bill in view of the approval of the treaty by the United States Senate.

Okuma Resigns. The Japanese cabinet headed by Count Okuma resigned on October 3, according to telegraphic advices from Tokyo. Count Okuma offered his resignation more than a year ago, but the emperor refused to accept it. The resignation at this time is said to have been forced by the failure of the Count to retain control of the coalition cabinet of which he was the head. Okuma has been known as a Moderate. It is announced that the new premier will be Governor-General Terauchi of Korea, who is a leader of the radical element in Japanese politics. This is the element which has been most insistent upon the new arrangement with China, and which is most likely to raise the question of Japanese exclusion with the government of the United States.

Mexico Abolishes Indiana. If Indiana were a state of Mexico, it would need to find a new political specialty; for in a recent decree, first-chief Carranza has abolished the office of vice-president, a product almost indigenous to Indiana. The decree also reduces the presidential term from six to four years, and provides that no president may be elected for two consecutive terms. Decrees have also been issued providing for a complete reestablishment of tribunals of justice throughout the republic. All courts must be in operation on November 1.

Senator Clarke Dies. Senator James P. Clarke of Arkansas, during the last two sessions president pro tem. of the United States Senate, died suddenly at his home at Little Rock, Ark., on October 1. Senator Clarke was a native of Mississippi, and had been a leader in Arkansas politics and on the Democratic side of the national Congress.

Liner Philadelphia Fights Fire. The American liner Philadelphia, which reached her dock in New York on October 1, fought a fire in No. 7 hold from Thursday afternoon until she reached her berth. As soon as the fire was discovered, the hold was filled with steam and a watch kept over it. When the hatches were uncovered in port, the fire was found to be extinguished. The cargo which was burned consisted mostly of woolen goods, and the fire was considered the result of spontaneous combustion.

For a Far Eastern Understanding. A conference in New York on September 28, participated in by forty American missionaries from China and Japan, Mission Board secretaries and prominent Christian laymen, passed a resolution requesting the President and Congress "to create a non-partisan commission of not less than five members, whose duty it shall be to study the entire problem of the relations of America with Japan and China," and the President was urged to invite the governments of China and Japan to appoint similar commissions. Resolutions were also passed endorsing the bill proposed by the American Bar Association providing for adequate protection of aliens, and urging the establishment of a Bureau of Information as to Eastern affairs, which should supply the press and public with unbiased and accurate information as to events in China and Japan and their relations to the United States. According to reports made at this conference, 15,139 more Japanese males have left America during the last seven years than have arrived.

A Century of Statehood. Admitted to the Union in 1816, the year 1916 has been a centennial year for the state of Indiana. Indianapolis took its turn in the celebration October 2–15. On the 5th a pageant was held in which the French priest LaSalle, first of all white men to set foot upon the soil of Indiana, and Clarke, who conquered the territory from the English, and Harrison, who first governed the Northwest Territory for the Union, as well as other notables, lived again. The Indianapolis churches on the evening of October 10 reviewed the religious history of Indiana for the hundred years in a processional pageant. Both ex-President Taft and President Wilson appeared on the program of the celebration.

Farmers Lay Permanent Roads. With the hearty cooperation of the farmers, Vermillion County, Ill., is building a system of hard roads, a concrete base with brick surface, to connect all the towns in the county. The total construction will exceed 166 miles of permanent roadway.

Dr. Jowett Returns. Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, and an honored member of the Christian Herald Family, returned to New York the last of September, after a three months' holiday in England and Scotland.

A Painful Prospect. October 2 was marked by a strike of 800 window-washers in New York City. The window-washers have been working only fifty-one hours a week at an average rate of sixteen dollars. They insist that they must work only forty-eight hours a week and receive e nteen dollars therefor. The window-c ning companies claim that it is impos le t pay the rate asked. Meanwh th windows bear mute and ing riou testimony to the reality of the rike.

The City's Night for P yer. When is prayer meeting nigh At present various Protestant chur es in the greater city of New York serve Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursda and Friday evenings, with an occ ional meeting on Monday night. It felt by many leaders in the church at if all the churches could agree up one evening and set apart this night fo ublic prayer, promoters of outside m tings which church people are expec d to attend would spare that e ning. Efforts are being made to bri the churches to some such agre ent. Such an arrangement, it is believ , will result in largely increased atte ance at all prayer meetings.

rmers Fight Milk "Trust." several months producers of milk e neighborhood of the cities of ago, New York and Boston have t better prices for the product of dairies. It has been charged that istributors in the three cities were ing together in a combination h had the form if not tho actual ture of a trust. The demands of roducers for higher prices were met he claim of the distributors that were making less than half a cent art net profit, although they were g farmers about three and a half for milk which they sold at nine ten cents. The distributors were ng with the farmers under individ- ontracts which, in the case of the York and Boston companies, ex- on October 1. About sixty per of the farmers organized them- s as the Dairymen's League. They anded an increase in price of forty- cents a hundred pounds, approxi- ly one cent a quart, and demanded that distributors mako contracts the League instead of with individ- lairymen. The distributors offered ght increase in price, declaring it to e limit possible, and refused to have dealings with the Dairymen's ue. The contracts expired with parties maintaining these positions. members of the League withheld own milk and greatly interfered the shipments of thoir neighbors, lting within threo days in putting York on a fifty per cent. basis, and in seriously crippling Boston dealers. On October 5 only thirty-five per cent. of the normal quantity of milk was received in New York. On this day, after Mayor Mitchel and the health commissioner had held numerous conferences at which no apparent progress had been made, one of the large milk companies announced that it would pay the advance asked for the sake of the babies in New York, although it would mean an additional cost of about $8,000,000 a year to the greater city. The company offered, however, to pay this price only for the month of October, during which time an investigation is to be conducted by the Attorney General of the state of New York. The other companies promptly fell into line, offering the increased price on the basis of a single month contract. This offer the dairymen refused, demanding contracts for a full six months, but indicating that they might accept individual contracts. Several riots occurred around milk-distributing stations in New York City on October 4 and 5. In the tenement districts, where the milk is handled largely by small dealers, who could not secure their supplies, many babies went without milk. At this writing it seems probable that the distributors in New York City will be compelled to grant the six months' contracts within forty-eight hours, as they are faced, not only by the necessities of the city, but by the possibility that, if the fight is prolonged, dairymen may organize their own system of distribution.

THEY are burning it in harbor, close against the sorry land;
They are burning it, in harbor, and it does not understand!
For it fought a nation's battles—but the nation's strife is o'er,
And they're burning it, cold-hearted, chained a captive to the shore.

It was brave, the little frigate, as it battled with the sea,
It was happy, joyous-hearted, as it darted wild and free;
And the soul of it is crying, and it does not understand—
For they're burning it, a captive, chained against the sorry land.

Ah, the winds and waves are calling. . . . But the smoke clouds rise on high,
And the frigate feels its courage and its high born purpose die.
Yes, it fought a nation's battles, but they've dragged it to the land,
And they're burning it, a captive, and it does not understand! M. E. S., Jr.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

SWEDEN has occupied considerable space in the cables of the past week, and a long dispatch from London itself testified to the seriousness with which the British government today regards the relations between Sweden and the Entente Allies. A new and rather acute crisis has arisen over the question of the right of Sweden to make such rules and regulations over the use of her territorial waters as she deems fit and proper.

The rule of international law that a nation owns the waters adjacent to its shores for a maritime league has long been accepted, and has been deemed by all authorities a well-settled one. Sweden, to avoid violations of her neutrality, she states, has mined the Kogrund channel leading out of the Sound into the Baltic, and reserved oxclusively to Swedish ships the navigation of this Kogrund channel, which is within Swedish jurisdiction under the rule of international law above cited. This action, however, aroused the Allies to anger, since it closed to them the passage through this channel, the use of which they regard as important to their interests, and, consequently, they forwarded a collective remonstrance.

To this Sweden replied that her territorial waters were her property and that she would not discuss the question of what she chooses to do with her own. Later in the week, for the first time since the war began, Dr. Hammarskjold, the Swedish premier, gave a statement to the press in the course of which, after reviewing Sweden's attitude in the war, he said: "And whenever Sweden has taken any step displeasing to one or another belligerent power, her action has been dictated solely by considerations of the kingdom's own necessities and its future welfare, and not by any partisan reasons. We hope sincerely that the belligerents will not make it impossible for us to maintain this attitude to the end."

The Greek situation is still clouded by contradictory rumors. Venizelos appears to be still in Crete organizing his provisional government, the seat of which, it is reported, will shortly be removed to the island of Mitylene. Tho premier, Kalogeropulos, and the cabinet of the Athens government, who have never been recognized by the Allies, resigned in the middle of the week. It is now asserted that the king has charged Mr. Nicholas Dimitrakopulos with the task of forming a new government. Outside of the above, nothing seems positive, except that up to October 5 Greece has not entered the war.

General Robertson, chief of the British general staff, gave an interview in the past week of some importance, and among other things said: "We must be under no delusion as to the end or probable duration of this great struggle—we must be prepared to continue for a time which cannot at present be estimated. In fact, we must prepare for the worst while we hope for the best. We must put it (the principle of national service) into practice because we want more men, we want them now, and eventually we shall want all who can be spared." This interview was a forerunner of a proposition which followed the next day, to extend conscription to Ireland, and it is announced that such a course will be brought up in Parliament as soon as that body assembles.

On the western front in the past week the activity has been almost entirely confined to the Picardy sector, and even here the fighting has been nothing like so desperate as that of the previous week, nor the changes in position anything like as important. This relative quietness has been to a considerable degree caused by the setting in of violent rainstorms.

On Sunday, October 1, hard fighting broke out on the whole front north of Thiepval to as far as Rancourt, the French and British attacking after unusually violent artillery preparation all along the line, but after several hours' fighting without much result one way or the other, this attack died away. South of the Somme there was quite a lively artillery duel.

On Tuesday, on their portion of the front the French made a little progress north of Rancourt and there was some artillery activity. On the British front the principal activity was south of Eaucourt l'Abbaye and to the north of Thiepval. The British took a few prisoners in this fighting. The most important episode on Wednesday was a very animated artillery duel on the Morval-Bouchavesnes line, the British capturing twenty-one Germans.

Great Britain admits a casualty list of some 307,000 in the Somme offensive. To this, colonial casualties must be added, as they are not included in the summary of British casualties.

France has called the class of 1918 to complete their training.

The Austro-Italian front can be dismissed with very brief mention, as nothing took place during the week except the usual skirmishing and routine artillery duels, all of which resulted in no changes of position of any moment. Early in the week the southeast of England was again raided by Zeppelins. The British reported that no military damage was done, and two of the raiders were brought down. Submarine activity is reported to be increasing, and a declaration of post-war reprisals on German shipping by Great Britain, in the hope of reducing this activity during the war, is regarded as likely.

THE Rumanians have had a very hard week, both on their northern and southern fronts. On the Dobrudja line, which crosses the district of that name lying between the Danube and the Black Sea, the Russo-Rumanian forces have all this week been assaulting almost without intermission the Bulgars and Germans under Mackensen, but seem to have made little or no impression. Mackensen's western flank still rests on the Danubo near Rasova, and its center at Cobadinu, positions which it has occupied for three weeks.

Russian gunboats on the Danube have aided in the assaults on the western end of this line, but so far without result. What has happened on the eastern end of the lino from Cobadinu to tho Black Sea appears rather obscure, but it is certain that the Germans cannot have been pushed back there very far, as had they been they would have been obliged to evacuate Cobadinu.

Farther south, on the Danube, one of the most extraordinary military movements of the entire war took place, ex-

Help Us Climb This Hill

IN the pilgrimage of Christian, as John Bunyan relates it, the travelers at one time came to a place which was seemingly full of insurmountable obstacles to their progress. They had reached the foot of the "hill called Difficulty." There were several paths, but none save one was the right path. It was a narrow way and led straight up the hill, which was steep and high and the going very hard. But it was the only way, and so, with a prayer on his lips and with occasional help, Christian faced the ascent and toiled on, sometimes on hands and knees, until the top was reached.

Now, good friends, the Christian Herald is about to begin—nay, has already begun—the ascent of the "Hill Difficulty," and it will need a helping hand as well as an encouraging word from every member of the great Christian Herald Family to enable it to reach the top. The difficulty in this particular case is one which for some time past we have known would have to be stoutly faced, viz.: The enormous rise in the price of print paper. That rise has already actually taken place, and the Christian Herald is right now paying fifty-three per cent. more for its paper. In its regular weekly editions the Christian Herald uses an average of forty tons of paper every week the year round, at a cost of $170,000. With the big advance in prices the yearly cost is now over $85,000 additional. We have explained in a previous notice that in other departments also heavy increases have taken place; the cost of ink, printing, electrotyping, have added fully $70,000 more to our budget.

All this is a burden which we are compelled to ask our readers to share with us. And the only way to do it is to increase the subscription price of the Christian Herald to two dollars per annum. Although we even now are under this burden and paying the additional costs described, the advance in the subscription price was put off until November 10, 1916, so as to give full opportunity to renew at $1.50 a year to those who think they cannot afford the increase.

Accordingly, until then we will accept subscriptions at $1.50 a year. Many other weeklies, both religious and secular, have long ago raised their subscription prices in anticipation of the increased cost, but we purposely delayed this as long as possible.

So now we are at the foot of the "Hill Difficulty" and have begun to climb, carrying the additional burden. Will you help us to bear it?

For a full generation the Christian Herald has been the leader among the religious home publications. It goes weekly into over 300,000 of your homes, and very many of you have been active members of our Family Circle and lovingly associated with us in Christian enterprises through all these years. You would miss the weekly visits of the Christian Herald and that pleasant fellowship in spiritual activities which has become a part of your daily life. You would miss, too, the comradeship which has kept you in touch with the Lord's work in many lands; which has brought you into personal contact with a wide variety of Christian service and has energized and quickened your own spiritual life and given it a meaning and purpose it may not have had before. Yes, you would miss the Christian Herald. And the Christian Herald would miss you, with your enthusiasm, your kind encouragements, your sympathetic cooperation in all its work, which is really your work, in a very comprehensive sense, as we have always been quick to recognize.

Well, here at the foot of the "Hill Difficulty" we want your hand in ours. We want each and all of you, the youngest and the oldest, to continue your active membership in our Family Circle. Hence we ask you, with full assurance in your compliance, to help us up the hill. There is no other way but the straight path which we are about to climb. And oh, with what courage and confidence we shall begin, with all of you alongside!

There was a little song that Christian sang as he began the long climb:

> The hill so high I covet to ascend;
> The difficulty will not me offend,
> For I perceive the only way lies here.
> Come, pluck up heart, let's never faint nor fear.

And when we get to the top, all of us together and not a face missing, the Family Circle will join as with a single voice in a good old-fashioned "Praise God!"

Handshaking

THIS is the season of the almost universal handshake, when the fine art of "greeting and good-by" is illustrated in the masterly manipulation of digits that are extended in serried rows by admiring constituents. Other social customs and conventions may wane and even disappear, but the handshake lives on unchanged, and is but little modified in the passing generations.

Just why we should immortalize the handshake and invest it with a dignity that distinguishes it among our social functions would be difficult to explain. There are other forms of salutation that seem in certain ways more picturesque and impressive. But the handshake has one definite quality which attaches to no other kind of greeting. Psychologists tell us that there is character in the hand which must find expression through the handshake. This may be true to some extent, when we give the right hand of fellowship to some one worthy of our confidence, but it would be rash to say that it is equally true o promiscuous handshaking. There are some who find in the custom a survival of the ancient pledge of mutual friendship, the handclasp and interlocking fingers betokening unity of interest, as though each would say, "Let's stand together; there's my hand on't."

Just how much or how little such reflections may influence the mind of the modern handshaker can only be surmised. But there are other things to consider. If he be a candidate for office, he is very likely at the close of a crowded day to look upon his swollen palm and overworked forearm, as though he had suffered a needless and barbarian infliction. The truth is, the precise value of a political handshake has never yet been determined. We grant, however, that there is something of a thrill coming to one who faces a mass of smiling people all crowding toward him, eager to grasp his extended hand, and who will be immensely tickled if, as their names are spoken by the introducer, the object of their admiration should condescend to mutter "Delighted! So glad to meet you"—as, with a skilful inclination of the wrist and forearm, he directs them gently but firmly ahead to make room for others whom he may know as little, or even less. Perhaps it would stump the ablest student of human character to define the handshake in all of its varieties. There are the high and elegantly poised shake, with a mild, perpendicular pumping motion that is affected in certain social circles; the tender, reminiscent shake that seems like a languid exercise on the piano; the formal, insipid shake that is meaningless, hence indefinable; the cordial, happy, easy-going shake that seems to say, "Put it there, old fellow!" and—let us speak of it in warning—there is the brutal, grinding, exhaustive handshake, used with a stiffened shoulder, that threatens dislocation.

To those who are looking forward to shaking hands with their favorite candidate we commend these observations, not that they are of any special value, but they may serve to invest the experience with some little interest, for, after all, doubt it as we may, there is a good deal of character in a handshake.

Paul and Mr. Rockefeller

APPROBATIVENESS, or the tendency to place too high an estimate on one's own character and accomplishments, is a prevalent trait among those we call "self-made men." When that affluent citizen, John D. Rockefeller—who, if report be true, has just reached the proud distinction of being a billionaire, probably the only one in the world—made the remark lately that if the apostle Paul had lived in these days he would have been a captain of industry he spoke wide of the mark. If he had made a study of Paul's career and character, applying to it the same acumen he displays in his own business affairs, he would have come to a different conclusion. There were few opportunities for money-making in apostolic times, and even had they been plentiful, Paul's mental and spiritual make-up would have led him in quite a different direction. Even before his conversion, he was a man of educated and refined tastes, a keen student of law and literature, with a training in the best schools. It was the custom in every Jewish family to teach the children some kind of manual labor, and in Paul's case this was simply done in obedience to custom and with little prospect that he would ever be dependent upon it for a livelihood. He brought to Christianity the trained mind of a powerful thinker, the tongue of an orator, and other eminent qualities, all of which were awakened and energized when he consecrated them to the apostolic work to which he was called.

How Paul himself valued worldly power, money and influence he has made very clear in the Epistles. His treasure was the "exceeding riches" of the divine grace (Eph. 2:7), and the "unsearchable riches" of Christ (Eph. 3:8). He placed so slight an estimate on worldly wealth that he warned his youthful associate not to trust in "uncertain riches" (I Tim. 6:1 Se how he warns the worldly and ambitious Cori hian lest any man build, as a foundation for chara r an fame and usefulness, on gold or silver (I Co 3:12
When his power was at the zenith and his ritu

October's Bright Blue Weathe

IT'S quite the conventional thing for folk o ca autumn the saddest time of the year—th easo when all of nature is dying pitifully; w n las leaves, sear and brown, cling upon withered ughs
And yet a poet once wrote a verse about autu tha sang itself into my heart:

> "Oh, sun and skies and clouds of June
> And flowers of June together;
> Ye cannot rival for one hour
> October's bright blue weather."

It may be the conventional thing to speal of au tumn as a sad season—but let's be unconve iona Let's go back into the country and wander roug woods gloriously splashed in rich scarlet a gold Let's go down the winding road banked wi wil asters and glowing goldenrod. Let's peep i o th apple orchard and the cornfield, where the pu pkin are round and yellow. Let's look up into e sk above—so bright it is that it seems to reflect t ver soul of heaven—and breathe in the keen fres ess the air. Is autumn the season of dying? A tumn with its blaze of color and its riot of perfume?

Of course, the gold and the scarlet and th purpl will have to go some day. But then, in the n ure things, nothing lasts past an appointed tim An isn't there something wonderful in the vital b uty the last months before winter? Isn't there a omis of beauty to come?

That's what autumn means to us. It is a p mise a bright blue "promise of a springtime to co in it own time. It's the goodnight hymn of Natur as sh goes to sleep—a sleep that is quiet and restf unde the snow. Autumn is not a tearful farewell it's

That is what autumn really means. What oes mean to you?

Poverty and War

A DISTINGUISHED Hebrew scholar, Rabb
Rudolph I. Coffee, of Chicago, has thi o sa on war and its concomitants, nationa wast and poverty:

"We believe that poverty is a disgrace to a ilize nation. Poverty will continue as long as we lerat warfare. How a sincere and devout believe n th Bible can advocate war passes comprehens n.
not Jesus called the Prince of Peace? A grea German critic has said that the finest expressi in th world's literature is the Messianic dream of lical Its sublimest utterance is, 'Nation shall n onge war against nation.' War spells waste, an wast mothers poverty. When nations cease w lesa murder, the second thought of Micah will llow
'they shall dwell each man under his own v e an

This from a Jew is one of the finest tribut eve

They Bury the Hatchet

TWO recent incidents show the determination of the people of the North and South to bury forever the hatchet of civil st. The presentation of a snare dr, carried by the Thirteenth Vir- gi Regiment in the Civil War, to the C ederate Museum in Richmond, was m by a delegation of Continentals fr Worcester, Mass., September 19. Se ral years ago the drum was bought by Dr. A. F. Wheeler from a local dealer, w had obtained it from the son of a nion veteran. It had been found ar ng the effects of the veteran some ye s after his death. Dr. Wheeler ele the Continentals, a military or nization of Worcester, as the m ium of returning the drum to the Sc h. Formal presentation exercises w held. It so chanced that the very ne day General J. R. Gibbons and ni members of the First Arkansas In ntry, Confederate Army, which ca ured a flag of the Seventy-sixth O at Ringgold, Ga., in the Civil W, visited Newark, Ohio, and re- tu ed the flag to the officers of the O regiment who live there. Gover- n elect Brough of Arkansas and G ernor Frank B. Willis and several st officials from Columbus took part in he program. The return of the d n and the flag are evidences of the fa that the North and South, so cr lly torn apart, are now entirely one in hought, affection, and purpose to m e our country great and meet our o gation to God and fellows as indi- v ials and as a nation in the strength o srael's God. The incidents suggest t e words: "How good and how p sant it is for brethren to dwell to- ge her in unity!" (Ps. 133 : 1.)

Tapestry Sold for $200,000

BEAUVAIS tapestry presented by King Louis XV. of France to Em- p or Kien Lung of China in 1766, and s en from the palace in Peking at the t e of the overthrow of the Manchu d asty, was recently sold by a New Y k dealer to a collector in Cleveland, O o, for $200,000. This tapestry is s l to be one of a set of six designed b the French painter Boucher for the e peror of China at the king's behest. T subject is "The Chinese Fan." T other five works still form a part of t treasures of the Peking Museum. T piece sent to Cleveland is ten feet s en inches high and ten feet three i es wide. What changes have been m le since the bestowal of the royal g! France now has no king, and C na no emperor. Both nations have p sidents. When the tapestry was g en the American Republic had not b n born, and the common people of t world had very little to say about t ir government. Now the people h e representation in about every na- t n of the earth. The forms of govern- m nt in France and China have changed, b the tapestry has remained un- c nged, the expression of the beautiful i ine art. It was customary for rulers i olden times to give presents to each o er, and often very costly ones, as is t s recorded: "And she gave the king undred and twenty talents of gold, and spices very great store, and precious s es; there came no more such abundance s pices as these which the queen of Sheba g e to King Solomon." (I Kings 10 :)

Francis Scott Key's Statue

THE contract for the construction of the monument to be erected by the f deral government to Francis Scott Key, author of the "Star Spangled Banner," has been awarded by the Secretary of War to Charles H. Niehaus, a sculptor of New York, whose design received first prize in the competition held in Washington recently. The memorial is to be erected in Fort McHenry Park in Baltimore under provision of an act of Congress which appropriated $75,000 for the purpose. The monument proper consists of the figure in bronze of a man forty-five feet in height, symbolic of music and patriotism. The main shaft of the pedestal is seven feet high and fifteen feet in diameter, and will be decorated with life-size figures. The surface of the shaft facing the main entrance to the park will bear a relief portrait of Francis Scott Key, framed by a draped flag of the United States, and flanked by two figures in honor of the American soldiers and sailors of 1812. There is already a beautiful monument of Key by Story in San Francisco, erected at the expense of James Lick. It speaks well for a nation to make permanent remembrance of those who write its verses and inspire its songs. For over a hundred years Key has been singing through the lips of patriotic millions, and will continue to sing "The Star Spangled Banner." In the monuments and song it can be said, "He being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11 : 4.)

Merchant Ship from Iceland

IT is said that the Gullfoss, under Captain Pjeturs, which recently reached New York City, is the first Icelandic ship to touch our shores for nine hundred years, since Lief, the son of Eric, landed at Cape Cod five hundred years before Columbus discovered America. The ship hails from one of the most remarkable countries in the world. It is a little island only 300 miles one way and 200 another, and has barely 80,000 inhabitants. No physical conditions could be much worse for a good civilization. Much of its soil is a lava bed, the season is short, the crops are few, a short grass supporting little cattle, sheep and ponies. They have the reindeer, the fox, and the eider-down duck. But they have an abundance of fish in the ocean about them, which gives them their chief industry. In the ninth century Iceland was discovered by Irishmen or Scotchmen, who made no permanent settlement. Seventy years later the Norwegians rediscovered and settled it, and for nearly a thousand years it has been one of the freest, happiest, and most prosperous nationalities on the earth, enjoying a republican form of government at first, then becoming the fortunate dependency of Norway, then of Denmark. It now has its own constitution and government under the direction of Denmark. They have no saloons, no paupers, no criminals worth counting, but they do have books and libraries and schools and papers and churches. There is not a dollar of national indebtedness, and there is money in the treasury. One reason why the ship came to New York is that the war interfered with the shipment of their fish to Denmark, and a delegation of merchants came from the capital of the island, Reikiavik, to see if they could not make some trade arrangements which would be mutually profitable with reference to the shipment to this country of herring and cod, which they have in such enormous quantities. The captain and crew and merchants all spoke the pure Icelandic language, which the Norwegians took to Iceland 900 years ago, the original Scandinavian language spoken now nowhere else on the globe. Iceland, little, with poor natural equipment, is really a great nation, with its Scandinavian language and literature, its old-fashioned Lutheran religion, and its total abstinence for the individual and total prohibition for the nation. It has illustrated the fact that "Righteousness exalteth a nation." (Prov. 14 : 34.)

Buys $27 for Thirty Cents

A BIG chest was bought for thirty cents by Edward Betson at Wooster, Ohio, at an auction of unclaimed express packages. When he reached home he found the box contained a set of burglar tools and stolen articles. He happened to be passing by and heard the auctioneer call out "twenty-five cents for the box and contents," and raised the bid to thirty cents, saying he considered the box worth that if there were nothing in it. When he got home and opened it, he found the chest contained two suits of clothes, a dozen automobile caps and $27 in bills tucked away in an old stocking. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred the one who buys anything "unsight and unseen," as the boys say who trade old knives, gets "stuck" in the bargain. The true way to make money for young or old is to earn it. This curse is man's greatest blessing, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." (Gen. 3 : 19.)

Religion and Business

MOSES ALEXANDER, the Jewish governor of Idaho, was the guest of the Men's Club of the Westminster Congregational Club of Spokane, Wash., recently, and made an address in which, among other things, he said:

> Young man, go buy a Bible, then go into business and make a success of it. If you have attended church you have assembled assets that are money. Tell the banker your needs. He may not have gone to church, but he appreciates religion. He has looked into it and knows its value. When he asks what security you can give, refer him to the pastor of your church and the teachings of your mother. The chances are that he will want to provide more than the $5,000 for which you applied. It is too bad he failed, it is said of another young man. He had to fail. He went the wrong way. He had no religion.

The governor, whose signature made Idaho dry, continued: "You can't get any booze in Idaho. Instead of the sign, 'Dew Drop Inn,' we have happy mothers, better times, increased savings accounts, less demand for credit and greater willingness to extend credit. At Boise, January 1, 1915, we discharged a Chief of Police and four policemen. No need for them." The address was lustily applauded. These words ought to be read with pride and inspiration by every citizen of the Republic in these days of moral and spiritual militancy. This commendation of our Bible and its religion as the basis of reform is most significant, and calls to mind these words of an ancient Jew: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." (Ps. 119 : 105.)

Austrians Find Treasure

THE Austrians, according to a special dispatch from Innsbruck, have found the famous treasures of the Detchani Monastery near Cettinje, Montenegro, which the monks had buried on the approach of a hostile army. The accumulations were those of seven centuries, consisting of jewels and old coin of every generation since the thirteenth century, golden vessels, and richly embroidered vestments. The value of the whole accumulation is estimated at several millions of pounds. It is said that a peasant betrayed to the Austrians the catacombs where the treasure was secreted. It was the custom in olden times to hide money and jewels in the ground. There is this reference to it: "And dig for it more than for hid treasures." (Job 3 : 21.)

Feat of Woman Swimmer

MISS EILEEN LEE, who swam 36¼ miles in the Thames River recently in ten hours and seventeen minutes, is said to have established a new world's record in long distance swimming for women. Miss Lee started at Teddington Lock and swam to Wapping and then back to New Bridge. She finished in excellent physical condition. It is strange so little attention is paid to the art of swimming by both men and women when so many drown every season. Every child should be taught to swim. Parents should look after this duty, and it is important enough as a physical exercise as well as protection to life to be made a part of the public school curriculum. They practiced the art of swimming in the olden times. The prophet thus uses the art to illustrate a truth: "And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim." (Isa. 25 : 11.)

Through the Orient for the Christian Herald

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—SECOND LETTER

Well, what are you looking at?

Crossing the Pacific

THE churn of the waters beneath our liner's stern tells us that we are under way at last. Our departure was postponed for five hours, but when the hour set arrived the gangplank dropped, and we began to move before "two bells" had ceased sounding. We drop mail at Victoria, so I have just a little time to give the hasty impressions of the Northwest as I saw it.

Spokane was described by a fellow traveler as a town, while he considered Seattle a city. But in the Middle West we would call Spokane a city, and a thriving one at that.

There are some very fine buildings in Seattle, and in parts the city has her hair done up and seems quite grown up; but in other parts she is still in swaddling-clothes, or at least in short dresses, which is quite metropolitan after all. I hit the town on a busy day, as a quarter-million-dollar shipyard was announced. The Lake Washington Canal locks were shut, and a big musical festival was opening.

On the coast they delight in music, much as they do in "stampedes" at Pendleton or Havre. We went past the Havre "stampede" at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and this is all I thought it well to know, until I return to the real Wild West, where fat pigs are driving out the mustang, and where big crops are causing two Fords and a Cadillac to spring where one bronco jumped before.

Getting back to Seattle, it seems that the little city is bound to win its place in the sun, even if the English and the Japs do all the shipping. The new locks separate the salt waters of Shilshole Bay from the fresh waters of Salmon Bay, which are to be raised thirty feet above the present low tide level, so that the big steamers belonging to the Allies can come in out of the salt water and let the barnacles drink themselves so full of fresh water that they will curl up and die, thus leaving the hulls clean for a new voyage.

The entire project is described by the enthusiastic Westerners as a five-million-dollar one and they hasten to add that besides the $2,275,000 appropriated by Congress, the state of Washington and King County each chipped in a cold million. This way of making $4,275,000 pan out in the form of a $5,000,000 project is one which is unknown in the East, where the result gained seldom exceeds the money appropriated. But the great possibilities for power derived from the spillway have been ignored, and that water will go to waste. It reminds one of a woman buying a fifteen-dollar dress for $13.39, and then riding home with her bargain in a three-dollar taxi. The opening, which consisted in closing the locks, was attended by the laborers in charge and myself. There was about as much excitement as there is in a well-regulated schoolroom when the teacher arrives on time.

This was also the day when the arrival of the undersea merchantman from Germany was announced, and one man said it was awful the way the New York papers would say anything to make news. It couldn't be done. How could it? That was just the part I could not explain.

Impressions of Vancouver

On board the Empress of Asia, off Vancouver Island, July 13, 1916. Vancouver is an annex to the Canadian Pacific Railway, a sort of enlarged extension of a long line of track. The main building there is the Hotel Vancouver, which is one of the many fine hotels operated by the little trunk line railway that ships men from England to Hongkong, across Canada, without a change of ticket.

I was very much surprised in Vancouver to see how many articles come from the United States. It seems a peculiar tribute to American "ready-mades" when the English in Canada forego their privilege to buy London clothes without the heavy woolen duty which we pay, in order to buy New York styles. American goods average ten per cent. higher than in the United States, but one sees them everywhere. The Canadians seem to like our breakfast foods, and no less than ten varieties of flakes, shreds and porridges could be had which were produced on the other side of the border, not to mention food coffees and Chicago ham. Some products are strictly native. Eggs marked "B. C. Fresh" could be had, but no hint was given as to the A. D. eggs, and lest I seem fresher than the eggs, I did not ask.

Penetrating the Oriental Mind

WE sat side by side in the second-class lounge of a trans-Pacific liner and discussed many things. Inevitably the conversation turned to the subject of the United States. We know each other pretty well, this keen-minded Chinese student and I, and what he has to say is usually worth listening to. He has spent seven years in America and is a graduate of Andover, Princeton and Columbia. He knows us as well as we ourselves do, with the added advantage that he sees us, not through our eyes, but as others see us.

"The trouble with America," he remarked quietly, "is that it is too self-centered. It lacks international outlook."

I smiled inwardly. That is strange doctrine from a Chinese student, a representative of the country that for centuries closed its doors to international relations and its thoughts to any outlook beyond its own boundaries.

But he had left that land, had learned a strange tongue, had made scores of American friends, and had lived with us during the most impressionable years of his life, and possibly his opinion was worth something after all. He elaborated his thought a little and showed how a land blessed with natural resources and prosperit had failed, as yet, to win a large place in intern ona affairs; and I even forgot the disinterested eff ts o our American missionaries in all the continen an in the islands of the seas, as he showed how s all place we have taken in affairs outside our own b ler.

"There were plenty of returning Chinese students"

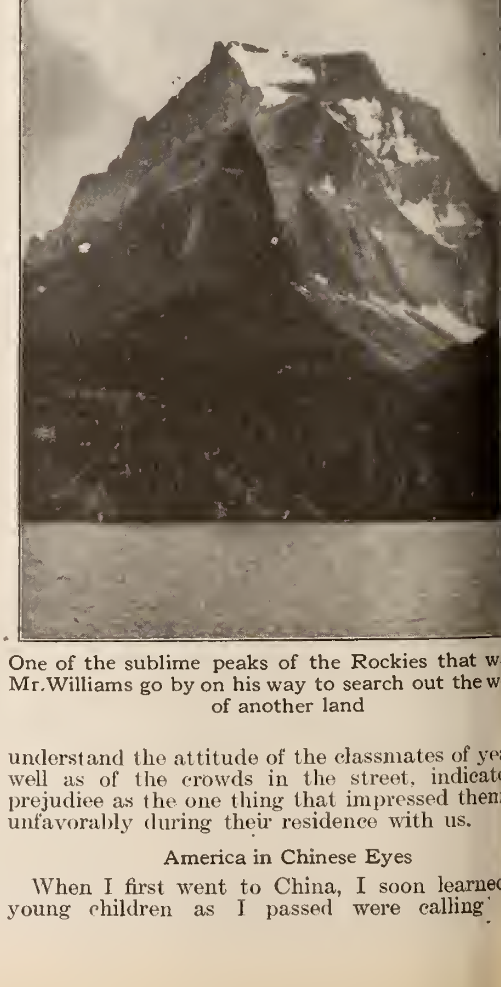
There were plenty of returning students han and it occurred to me that a questionnaire might yea something of interest. The reaction of Americ lif and thought on these well-educated men sho l h worth knowing.

This is the questionnaire as I prepared and passed it around among my Oriental travelin om panions:

> I would like to get the opinions of the returning stud ts o the points herein mentioned with the purpose of dete min the reaction of American life and thought upon t well educated Oriental students who have had a temporar om and work in America. I would therefore consider it a k lnes if each student would answer as fully as possible the f wing questions. Be as frank as possible. I want what yo ink not what you think it would be polite to say.
>
> Where educated in the East? (Elementary school and c ege.
> How long in America, and what colleges attended the
> What major subjects and what degrees?
> What religion?
> What is to be your work in your native land?
> What reforms does your country need, and in what w car they be carried to the millions of common people
> What things in America impressed you most favorably
> What things impressed you most unfavorably?
> What mission, if any, have American capitalists, ders teachers or missionaries in your native country?
> Have you any further remarks that would be of intere
> State just what you think, as bluntly as you care to.

Orientals are reserved in their statement and some preferred not to answer the questions propounded; but a dozen of them did, and althoug several years' residence in the Near and Far Ea had prepared me for some of their replies, I was su ised to find that on one matter at least these hol s of collegiate degrees from our foremost educ onal institutions were practically unanimous. Eig out of twelve were unfavorably impressed by the acial prejudice in the land of liberty and equality.

As Americans we pride ourselves on the fac that when other nations demanded a large indemnit rom China, we returned $8,784,500 to the Chinese, o, in courteous recognition, devoted it to the supp t of Chinese Indemnity students in the United ates. In China, that one fact sticks out very large, ke a dollar bill on a collection plate. But eight out of elve students who have lived with us long eno to understand the attitude of the classmates of ye s, as well as of the crowds in the street, indicat race prejudice as the one thing that impressed them ost unfavorably during their residence with us.



One of the sublime peaks of the Rockies that w hed Mr. Williams go by on his way to search out the w ders of another land

America in Chinese Eyes

When I first went to China, I soon learne hat young children as I passed were calling a

G ss whether this is in the United ates or Japan. "The United States?" Wrong

"foreign devil." But I never knew a grown-up to apply that term to me, and surely race prejudice against me was not noticeable. Quite the opposite. Yet there is no question that Americans in China are more offensive in their attitude than are Chinese students in America. We resemble the British in wanting to be thought a little better than the "native." The Chinese students in Am ica are modest and unobtrusive. Nothing in the conduct is calculated to stir up race prejudice. Ev the laundrymen and other laborers in America hav done little to make us hate them, and their nu er is almost negligible. Having had Chinese stu nts as classmates in America, I was surprised to ar this protest against race prejudice. Then I sto ed to think.

e twelve students who answered hold nineteen deg es, including, in addition to the degrees of Ba elor of Arts, Science and Literature, Masters deg es in Arts, Engineering and Science. Others on oard hold degrees in Medicine, Agriculture, Th ogy, Education and Mining. One is a Ph.D. Sel m would one find so small a group so widely tra ed.

e of the twelve attended Columbia, four studied at inceton, three at Wisconsin, two each at M. I. T. an Colorado School of Mines, and one at Illinois, Ha ard, Purdue, New York Library School, Southwe rn College, University of Pittsburg, Syracuse and Co ell; an average of two schools in different parts of e country for each student. They probably kn as much about the feeling in the colleges as an ne.

e next thing which impressed these students un orably in our country was alcoholism. The Ch se drink wine, and I have seen the red-faced, str ht-legged but addle-brained drunkenness which Ch se wine produces quite as often as I have seen th reeling drunkenness of American tipplers; but ou alcoholism strikes these representatives of a co try which has freed itself from the curse of opium as most unfavorable commentary on our national a personal life.

M issippi Bay, where Admiral Perry discovered Japan in 1854

he Chinese are accounted the best merchants in th world. A sale, with them, is a matter of individual ba aining, rather than of widespread placards. Yet th see in the land that has dotted their country with mission schools in which they were trained, and hospitals in which they were born, a commercialism and money-madness which impresses them unfavorably.

Other matters which they do not like in our life are social corruption, divorce, industrial unrest, undue freedom of the sexes, political corruption, excessive display and luxury and indiscriminate dancing.

There are, however, many things in our life which they admire. First among these is our democratic spirit. Next come efficiency, good government and fine educational institutions. Our public and scientific spirit, freedom and order, industrial and economic organization and the mutual respect that Americans have toward one another are also matters which favorably impress these wide-awake students of our institutions.

The Chinese Attitude Toward Christianity

AMONG Americans who are welcome in China, the capitalist is most often mentioned. China may desire many things eventually; but her immediate need, according to these men, is money to develop the great national resources with which the great republic abounds. There is no prejudice against American teachers and missionaries, and in spite of the fact that one student replied that our workers are of great use to China, "if supervised by our [his] people," most of the replies showed a true appreciation for what the teachers and missionaries have done. One student says, "To the American teachers we owe much for their introducing modern ideas to the young Chinese students."

These men are not on their way to America. They are on their way back. Some of them went to live among Christian people, with the belief that Christianity was the great mainspring of world progress. None of them mention it as they return to their own people after absorbing the benefits which America could offer them. This is a common experience. A graduate of a mission school, who has come to regard Christianity as the giver of a more abundant life, goes to a Christian country, there to admire material civilization and to deplore the race prejudice, alcoholism and divorce, which affect him more strongly, perhaps, than does our Christianity.

Mr. Williams's first purchase in Japan was five cents' worth of ice-cream. (This is not Mr. Williams, it is the millionaire ice-cream vendor)

The point is simple if analyzed. These men have a deep respect for Christianity, but it was not a gift of America to them. It came from God, and not from the United States. There is no confusion of church and religion, religion and state, in their minds. America and God are not synonymous terms, any more than Chinaman and heathen should be synonymous with us.

In answer to the question, "What reforms does your country need, and in what ways can they be carried to the millions of common people?" ten out of twelve answered, "General education, carried out by compulsory methods." The idea of compulsion has never been attractive to the Chinese before. But if you could see ten-year-old boys swinging up the narrow streets, their brows furrowed by hard labor and a heavy burden slung over their shoulders, doing a man's work and keeping a man from earning a fair wage, you would agree with these returning students that if China is to free herself from foreign compulsion, she must introduce compulsory methods in her own educational and military systems.

Estimates regarding literacy vary from five per cent. of the entire population to seventy per cent. of the male population, but more and more are coming to read, as transportation methods and communication by telegraph and post office are being improved. A newspaper now costs as much as a meal in many parts of their country, and this is not conducive to literacy nor unity of sentiment; but a single paper serves a much larger group of readers than with ourselves. Literacy is the most necessary step toward national unity, and education is the most needed reform. Even those students who do not appreciate the efforts of evangelistic missions testify sincerely to the great value of American educational missionary work. Not only are American mission schools prominent in the present educational system in China, but more such schools are urged by the Chinese.

Let's hope the author will tell us later on what this child is hiding behind her back Adequate military preparedness is desired by China, which has not only seen the fate of Belgium and the dilemma of Greece, but has so recently seen her own neutrality violated in Shantung, during and after the investment of Kiaochau, without a word of protest from the nation which first advocated the "open door." The Chinese are not an aggressive people; but modern war, killing its thousands, is teaching the necessity of might to preserve right.

Here in our group, meeting on terms of friendship with the Chinese, and teaching them Japanese in return for Chinese, are two theological students from Japan. Their answers follow the same line as those of the Chinese students, except that they point out that it is California, and not America, that shows race hatred toward them. Coming from a land where social evils are rife, they deplore the social evils in America.

Chinese exclusion may not be a live topic, but it holds a prominent place in the minds of the very students who are supported in their education by the money we returned to China. Japan may have allowed a "gentlemen's agreement" to cloud for a time the immigration question, but the question is not dead. It only sleeps, and not infrequently these days it rolls over and mutters a few words under its breath.

We may look down upon Oriental peoples, but that is no evidence that they worship us. We may send missionaries to them, but that is no guarantee that we are Christian in more than name. We may be polite, though we cannot surpass them in that. But just across the Pacific are two mighty races, our brothers in the human family, and as long as our women fear and hate them and our traders force morphia and opium and cheap cigarettes on them and we treat them as inferiors, justice will not prevail.

We shall probably meet some such well-to-do family as this. Note the overskirts on the boys—typical dress of the student (Try to get your boy to go to school in a skirt!)

Chasing John Barleycorn Out of the Northwes

By EDGAR WILLIAM DYNES

ON January first of the present year Oregon, Washington and Idaho went dry. On June first Manitoba followed. On July first every bar in Alberta went out of business. In Saskatchewan every bar was closed in July of last year, although liquor is still sold in that province through government dispensaries. Later on the people will vote on a referendum to abolish the traffic altogether. In September British Columbia voted to make the province dry on July first, 1917. The dry forces in Montana are lined up for battle, and developments of an important character may be expected.

In most instances the dry laws were carried by very substantial majorities. In Manitoba the vote was more than two to one, in Alberta it was almost two to one, while Washington had a majority of more than fifteen thousand votes. In Idaho the state became dry by a vote of the legislature without a reference to the people.

In Washington the liquor forces are petitioning for a re-vote, but the indications are that the dry majority will be larger than ever. Prominent newspapers, like the Seattle Times, and the Spokesman-Review of Spokane, are now openly on the side of prohibition.

"MY paper fought its hardest against prohibition," says Major C. B. Blethen, a former mayor of Seattle, and editor of the Times. "We fought it on economic grounds alone. We believed that in a great seaport city, with a population of upwards of 300,000, prohibition would be destructive; it would be an economic disaster. We believed that under our system of licensing saloons we had the liquor traffic about as well controlled as it could be, and we wanted to let it alone; and so we fought as hard as we could fight. . . . We have had a month of it now, and we already know that it is a great benefit, morally and from an economic standpoint. . . . Seattle had 260 saloons, and we had an average of 2,600 arrests a month for crimes and misdemeanors growing out of liquor-drinking. In January we had only 400 arrests, and 60 of those were made January first, and were the results of hang-overs from the old year. That in itself is enough to convince any man with a conscience that prohibition is necessary. There can be no true economy in anything that is immoral.

"And on top of that great moral result we have these economic facts: In the first three weeks of January the savings deposits in the banks of Seattle increased fifteen per cent. There was not a grocery story in Seattle that did not show an increase in business in January greater than in any month before in all the history of the city, except in holiday time. In all the large grocery stores the increase was immense. In addition to this, every dry goods store in Seattle except one, and that one I have no figures from, had a wonderful increase in business. Each store reported the largest business ever done in one month, except in holiday time."

OTHER independent testimony has been given to the effect that before the end of February every clothing store dealing in children's clothing had its stocks in that line completely cleaned out. And every merchant gave the same reason. The drunkard's child was a drunkard's child no longer. The booze money was being spent in clothes.

So much for Seattle. Take Spokane, a city with a large floating population. If the wets were right Spokane stood to lose as well as Seattle. The following is taken from the Spokesman-Review of the issue of March 11 of the present year:

> "Last night Mrs. Robert Fairley, the steward at the county jail, served meals to forty-one inmates, all the prisoners the jail contained. In March last year the county was feeding an average of 230 prisoners daily. A year ago today there were twenty-five women confined at the county jail, the majority of whom were drug and whisky victims. Tonight there will be but one woman at the jail to be cared for.
> "Last year at this time there were nearly 100 prisoners at the jail who were drunkards and drug fiends. When a reporter visited the jail yesterday not one such case was in evidence."

AND just a little more testimony from an editor of a daily newspaper. I like to quote an editor's testimony, as they are keen, shrewd men of the world for the most part, and look at things from the standpoint of community efficiency. Here is what Henry Rising, editor of the Spokane Chronicle, an evening paper (owned by the Spokesman-Review, the two forming perhaps the most potent newspaper influence in the whole Northwest under one management), says in a letter over his own signature after going into a great deal of detail in regard to the very noticeable improvement in economic conditions:

> "Add to this that unemployment is less, poverty less, than ten months ago; divorces are fewer; collections are better; dives have closed; white slavers are not to be found; burglaries and holdups have dwindled; the panhandler has vanished; grocers, clothing merchants, shoe dealers, report gains in business ranging from five to thirty-five per cent.; new business blocks are being erected; the banks hold millions more in deposits; the hotel men, who were near panic over the coming of the new law, are wearing smiles as they turn surplus guests away.
> "The Chronicle did not fight for prohibition in 1914. It is ready at ten seconds' notice today to fight its best against any serious effort to repeal or cripple the prohibition law."

GOVERNOR MOSES ALEXANDER of Idaho states that, although state-wide prohibition has been in effect in Idaho only since January first of the present year, still its beneficial effects have become so apparent even to the most prejudiced opponents of prohibition that there is no longer any real opposition in the state.

In British Columbia the prohibitionists had a long, hard fight before they could induce the government to agree to submit the matter to a vote of the people. The liquor interests were very strongly intrenched, and the government had pinned their faith to a very stringent license law passed in 1911. In addition, the government had an almost unbelievable majority in the legislature, having no less than forty members in a house of forty-two.

The Prohibitionists called a convention early in August, 1916, and agreed upon a demand for provincial prohibition. For five months afterward they pressed the matter to the attention of the government; but to all their requests they received either an evasive reply, or else none at all. Things reached a deadlock.

And then something happened.

It came about in a very simple way. Hon. W. J. Bowser, who succeeded Sir Richard McBride as premier in December last, rearranged his cabinet, and under the law prevailing in all British countries, a newly appointed cabinet minister has to go back to his constituents for reelection. This threw the control of the city of Vancouver open.

The Liberal or opposition party gave a clear-cut statement on the question of prohibition. They agreed to put a bill through the legislature, in the event of their attaining power, and when endorsed by the people by a majorit vot it would become law. The gove mer party remained non-committa Th result was that the independe pro

Women of the Andine Countries

THE cloak of old-world Spain still enfolds the minds of the women of the Andine countries. There are as yet but faint stirrings toward a larger liberty and wider outlook. It is a far cry from the western slopes of the Andes to the dawn of women's rights, emancipation and the vote, but the morning star of duty as wife and mother, even in their limited conception of its meaning, shines all the brighter in comparison. In their own wide ramified family circles their influence is felt, while their outside interest centers in the church.

The wealthy señora is looked up to by her poorer sisters and in the small towns and haciendas (ranches), where her numerous family connections are the leading people of the community, she extends a kindly and charitable beneficence to them and to all who serve them in any capacity. When these women come of old Spanish stock they are extremely exclusive, and ancient rules of etiquette guide their social relationships. Their daughters go to the convent schools, receive a limited education, and return home to continue the same régime as has held sway since the day when their forebears left Spain.

The middle-class woman enters more into the interests of life as her husband sees them; she is less exclusive and more liberal in her ideas. She develops sturdier qualities, manages her house, and loves her children. She attends church, helps in charitable institutions, and enjoys the theater.

Among the working classes, who form the bulk of the population, the woman has almost invariably to become a wage-earner and help in the support of the family. In order to secure her husband's fidelity she has to consider his wishes in every respect. Among foreig rs i is a proverbial saying that "(lean women make good wives, but (lean men bad husbands." The workir class woman has no contact with the ider interests of life, but is contente with things as they are.

Among the Homeseekers of Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just returned from an automobile trip through some of the ich farming lands of the Tanana Valley. This part of Alaska has the gest body of good soil in the territory nd the government is expecting an inva on of homesteaders as soon as the railr d from Seward to Fairbanks is com eted. Much of the land is in what is k wn as the Tanana bottom. It com ises a tract about 200 miles long and n places, 70 miles wide. Altogeth it is about as big as the state of New ersey, and its cultivable country is o fifth as large as the state of Ohio. My urney today was through a rolling regi as beautiful as the Pennsylvania foot ls of the Alleghanies. The land rises rom the river and gently slopes to the ountains, which are far off in the dist ce.

A we rode up the valley it was difficu to realize that we were on the bor of arctic Alaska. The thermometer was at 90 degrees in the shade. The was no snow on the tops of the mou ains, and the hills and valleys wer covered with green. At times we pas d through plains spotted with wild flow s. There were beds of buttercups as y low as gold, and daisies as pink as the heeks of a baby. In some places the ound was covered with blueberry bus s, the fruit as large as cherries and loa l with juice. Now we passed thr gh forests of birch, spruce and cotton od. Some of the trees were two feet n diameter. Where the woods had bee ut or burned away there were vast exp ses of flaming pink flowers as high as t wheels of the car, and everywhere the oadside was hedged with green gra and red-top that reached to the hub Now and then we went over cordur , our automobile bouncing high and the fast driving of the Jehu of this nor ern frontier.

W passed many small farms cut out of t woods, with oats-hay and potatoe n blossom. We saw cattle grazing, and y and by came to the experiment farm which the government has establish in the heart of the Tanana Valley, abo four miles from Fairbanks. The farm is beautifully located. It consists of 80 acres of gently sloping hillsides and ottom land, sloping at one side to a we stream and rolling thence on up and ver a low range of hills.

A one end of the farm is the site rec ly selected for the Alaska Agricultur College, the cornerstone of which was aid in 1915. The college will stand on hill, giving magnificent views for fift miles up and down the Tanana Val y, taking in Fairbanks and also the Blu Mountains, far off in the distance. On bright day Mount McKinley is visi e.

I pent some time at the experiment sta n. The home of the farmer is a one tory cottage surrounded by beautifu flowers. At one side of it is a gre bed of pansies, and in the front yar are more pansies, in patterns of int ate design. About the porch sweet pea have climbed to the height of your hea and the blossoms have a color and fres ess not found in the sweet peas in e States. This is so of all the flo rs of Alaska. The growth is so rap , they seem to have been born ove ight, and that in the rain.

N AR by is a hothouse where toma oes and cucumbers are grown, and acr s the way are barns and outhouses wh grain hay is stored for the winter. Th is also a root cellar in the side of a h not far from the barn. This is a cav about sixty-five feet in length and so lin with board that it is clean and dry the ear round. It will hold hundreds of ns and is used for storing the potatoe nd other root crops. The potatoes are ut into the cellar as soon as they are ug, which is some time in August, and hey will keep there for more than a yea Just opposite the root cellar and a l le below it is a large turnip patch. I climbed the fence and pulled up a turnip. It was eight inches thick, and by actual measurement the leaves were seventeen inches long.

During my stay I talked with the superintendent. His name is J. W. Neal. He comes here from the Agricultural Department at Washington. He tells me he has about 100 acres under cultivation, almost all of which is in grain of various kinds. He is clearing more land and extending the farm. I asked him as to the cost of clearing. Mr. Neal replied:

"It cannot be done for less than $100 per acre, and some tracts will cost more. The trees have to be cut, the roots gotten out, and the ground and trees must be burned over in order to kill out the moss. Some of the land has to be drained, and it takes some time before it can be brought under cultivation. A great part of the country is underlaid with prehistoric ice, the soil being frozen down to bedrock. In some cases the frozen stratum is only a few inches below the surface, and in others it may be a yard or so deep. After the land is cleared this gradually melts until it has no effect upon cultivation and growth."

Mr. Neal does not think that large farms will pay in this part of the world. He says the markets for a long time will be limited to the local community which will be supported by the mines. The demand will steadily increase as the country is opened, and in time there will probably be a considerable population of small farmers.

OUR next visit was to a dairy farm belonging to a Mr. Hinckley. This farm supplies much of the milk and cream consumed in Fairbanks, and it also sells butter, buttermilk and cottage cheese. The milk brings $1 a gallon, and cream $1 a pint. Buttermilk sells for $1 a gallon, butter 75 cents a pound and cottage cheese or smearease for 50 cents a quart. We went with Mr. Hinckley to the barn to look at his cows. He has twenty, which give on the average three or four gallons of milk every twenty-four hours. The milking is done twice a day, and the cows had been brought into the barn at the time of our visit. They are what you would call good average stock in the States.

Before leaving I pulled up a handful of the young oats growing outside the barn and measured it with a two-foot rule. The stalks were eighteen inches long. The oats had been planted only three weeks ago.

LEAVING the dairy, we went on to visit a truck farm which lies on the very edge of Fairbanks. This is a homestead that was taken out ten years ago by Stacia Rickert, the wife of a business man of Fairbanks. It consists of 320 acres of land, and it lies within a mile of the center of the town.

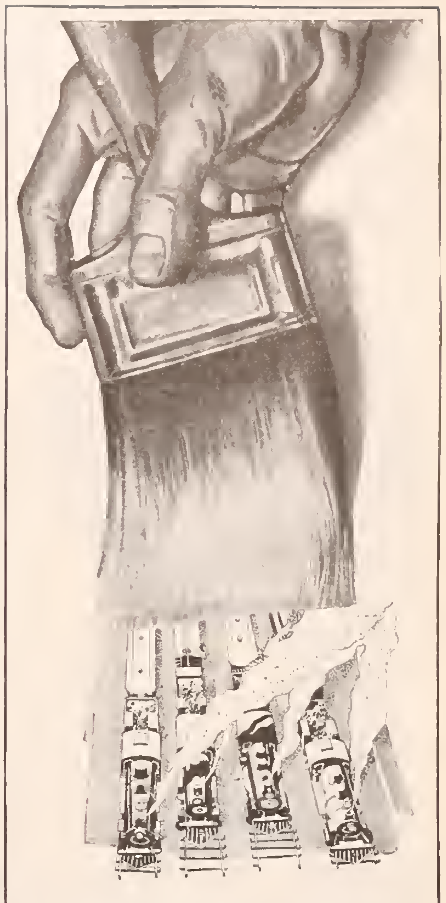
The gardens of this farm cover twenty or thirty acres. As we walked through them I asked as to the crops, and was told that there are now in the ground 29,000 cabbages, 30,000 stalks of celery and some acres of head lettuce. The celery is especially fine, growing to a height of four feet. Some of it was sent to Montana a few years ago to show what Alaska could do, and President Taft sampled it during his trip through that state. He declared it the finest he had ever tasted. Mr. Rickert expects to harvest this year about twenty-five tons of turnips, five tons of beets and thirty tons of cabbages. As we went through one of the fields I pulled up a cabbage and put it on the scales in the greenhouse. It weighed twenty-six pounds. Others weigh more. Cabbages are now worth 8 cents a pound, and cauliflowers are selling at from 25 to 26 cents a pound. Some of the crop is sold when it is taken out of the ground. The rest is stored away in the cellar and marketed during the winter.

The hothouses are one of the most important parts of this farm. There are several, each devoted to a different crop. There is one 120 feet long that grows melons only, including watermelons, casabas and cantaloupes. The vines are trained upon wires running along under the glass, and from the beds up to the roof. From these wires the melons hang down, the heavier ones being supported by rags as though in a sling to prevent them from breaking the vines. Some of the cantaloupes are now ripe. I asked as to the price, and was told that they sell for a dollar a pound. Some of the melons weigh four or five pounds, which means four or five dollars for a cantaloupe.

During my stay in the Tanana Valley I have asked the farmers and agricultural experts some questions as to the farming conditions. They are altogether different from those of most parts of the United States proper. Fairbanks is more than one hundred miles south of the Arctic Circle, and the growing season is short, ranging from three to four months, and extending in favorable seasons perhaps a half month longer. The last spring frosts occur about the middle of May, and frosts begin again during the latter part of August or the first of September. There is really no darkness in midsummer, and the long sunlight adds to the growth of the crop. June, July and August are warm, the thermometer sometimes going to 96 degrees.

THE winters are cold in the Tanana Valley, the mean temperature in January being about 20 degrees below zero. The thermometer ranges from the freezing point to 60 or 70 degrees below zero during December, January and February. After the freeze-up, which begins about the last of October, there is steady cold weather from then until May. The ground is frozen as hard as a rock; quiet bodies of water become ice to a depth of six feet; and there is from three to six feet of ice on the lakes and streams. The Yukon has three or four feet of ice. The streams are then the sled roads, and travel is easier than in the summer. The ice and snow begin to melt in April and early May. The small streams flow into the larger ones, raising the ice sheet so that it is torn away from the shore. It breaks into pieces and starts on its way to the sea, the cakes of ice grinding against one another and piling up in great masses. As they go on they carry every movable thing in their path. This movement lasts for a week or so, when the streams clear, and the boats start out from their winter quarters.

I CLOSE this letter by warning the would-be settler that cutting a farm from the forest and dragging it out of the ice is no baby job. It is better suited to men of from twenty to thirty than those over sixty. The first year or so will be full of hard work, and the homesteader should bring along enough money to keep himself and his family during that time. Practically all the land needs clearing. A cabin will have to be built, and a garden patch cut out of the woods. A log barn will be needed, and, if possible, a hothouse should be erected. The most of the work will have to be done by the farmer and his family. Wages are high. A common hand gets $5 or $6 a day and board, or, if hired right along, from $100 to $150 a month. Mr. Rickert pays his "lady cook" $75 a month and her board. A servant who does general housework will want $10 or $12 a week, and women who come in to help on wash days and sweeping days will charge from 50 cents to 75 cents an hour. These are the wages in Fairbanks. The result is that most of the women do their own work, hiring help only for the heaviest kinds of labor.



Let the Country's Great Railroads Select the Best Paint for Your House

Sherwin-Williams products are used by practically all of the railroads in this country. On every kind of surface, in every kind of weather, in all parts of the country, these paints and varnishes are standing up against the most destroying forms of wear and tear and living up to the O. A Kiss and a Shower of Blows

THE Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, in its Year Book for 1916, gives a partial list of funds provided in America for the relief of war sufferers, the amounts (including both cash and goods) being as stated below.

There is a disposition in certain quarters to laud such large giving and to style the United States the "almoner of nations." It is true that the sums named below are made up in part of gifts both large and small that have cost real sacrifice to the givers, and represent the heart-felt pity of thousands of American men and women and even children; but these suns are not made up entirely of such gifts, and when we consider the tremendous total as an expression of American goodness of heart, we should at the same time consider the vast sum of money which has been made here through the shipment of ammunition abroad, ammunition which has been used to create the very conditions which make the giving of charity to Europe necessary. This huge fortune which "America" has already made out of the war in Europe is even now exciting the covetousness of other nations. Our gifts to the innocent sufferers of the war are but a drop in the bucket in comparison with the real need that exists, and while we laud ourselves for giving this drop, one Wall Street firm alone, it is claimed, has already made more out of this war than the total amount of all the charities contributed by the people of America to war's innocent victims.

It is not reasonable to suppose that the work of relief will ever catch up with the accumulation of gain, but that painful comparison should only spur on right-minded men and women to doing their utmost to alleviate the suffering that madmen on both sides of the Atlantic are inflicting on the human race.

GIFTS of our readers to the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War are, to some extent, included in one or another of the above divisions. Thus far we have distributed out of the fund the amounts shown below, and are about to send additional sums to points where the suffering seems the most acute. As rapidly as enough accumulates to justify it, remittances are sent abroad to relieve the always accumulating need. They have now been made as follows: Armenia, $10,330.75; Austria, $12,500.00; Belgium, $42,500.00; England, $12,500.00; France, $12,500.00; Galicia, $15,500.00; Germany, $12,500.00; Holland (for Belgian Refugees), $20,000.00; Palestine, $5,545.00; Persia, $500.00; Poland, $33,230.05; Russian Jews' Relief Fund, $3,000.00; Servia, $5,000.00.

Would it were possible in these four lines to impress upon every heart the increasing, unparalleled need that exists in these stricken lands.

Gifts should be addressed to the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

To Wanderers

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

A LETTER, enclosing a little poem, came to my desk this week. The letter was very short. "Will you," it said, "publish these verses so that one who is wandering from us, we know not where, may, God willing, see them and come home? ANNA BIRD."

perty, Mo.

The poem was longer. It was called—

Dear Lad, Come Home

DEAR Wanderer in the night afar,
Please tell your loved ones where you are
As constant as the stars above.
Our hearts to you, dear lad we love.
Amid the Sabbath hymns of cheer
We long for you and wish you here.
Our God be with you where you roam,
And give you peace, and bring you home.

May this unclouded day of rest
Bring comfort to your burdened breast;
May heavenly keepers round you stand
In one unbroken shining band.
And when you lay your tired head
Beside the weary ways you tread,
Be nearer than all fear and loss
The mighty Saviour of the cross.

Dear lad we love, come home again,
And let us share your every pain,
Come back to peace and happiness,
To life and constancy and rest.
Our God will show you mercy here,
Will bear your burden, dry your tear.
Our hearts are with you where you roam;
Dear lad we love, our lad, come home!

Heaven is high above our head,
Great his mercy, God has said,
As far from us he bears as far
As set from the morning star.
He knows our frames, that we are dust,
He sees us when we yield and trust—
Turn back, and God will keep your way,
And make your darkness bright with day

Dear lad we love, our lad, come home!
We wait with longing till you come,
To hear your step, to see your face.
How lonely is your vacant place!
Think once again of all you leave;
Think of the friends who for you grieve;
Put from you every doubt and fear—
Love, peace, and hope await you here.

THIS isn't the first letter of the same sort that has come to the Christian Herald offices. Many of them come to us every year. The majority, of course, are not poems—some are little notes, some are brief notices, some of them are merely pathetically misspelt sentences written on torn scraps of paper. But there is the same spirit behind each one of them, from the most appealing verses to the most crumpled scrap of paper. And that message is—Wherever you are, whatever you have done, we still love you. Come home!

One sees the same kind of notice every day in the personal column of any newspaper. Perhaps it's addressed to a girl's name, perhaps it's addressed to a boy. Perhaps to a father or a brother or a sister. There's a plot for a story in every one of these notices—and it's always the same story—a story of forgiveness and understanding and renewed love and trust.

ONCE when I was a tiny girl I broke a beautiful hand-painted tea-set of my mother's. In my childish way I knew that it had cost a great deal of money, and that, aside from the commercial value of the thing, the design could never be replaced. The breaking of it had been an unfortunate accident; but as I stared, round-eyed, at the hopelessly shattered pieces, I was filled with a fear—a fear made up half of regret and half of dismay. My mother had never punished me for destroying anything in an accidental way, but, I told myself, this time might be an exception to the general rule. This time I might be punished.

Laboriously I picked up the fragments of the tea-set and placed them carefully upon a table. And then, fortified by a chubby fistful of cookies from the silver cookie jar, I stole away to my favorite hiding-place in the attic, said hiding-place being beneath a tall wooden bed. I lay there for hours in the dust and darkness and told myself many ghost stories—the shivery kind.

In the course of the afternoon my mother found the pieces of the tea-set, carefully piled on the table, and guessed how they had been broken. But she didn't find me until long after supper, when, frightened by the growing darkness of the attic, I crawled dustily from under the bed and stole downstairs, a shamefaced little culprit.

They had been worried about me, downstairs, for there was a brook near our house, and a railroad track that was a constant source of worry to grown-ups. And so, when I appeared suddenly in the midst of the apprehensive family group, no mention was made of the tea-set. I was loved, and kissed, and comforted with my belated supper. And then, at last, I spoke:

"Didn't you mind—about the dishes?" I questioned.

From the look on my mother's face I knew that the dishes had been forgotten. And when she answered me it was to tell me that of course she was sorry—because she had been fond of the tea-set—but that no matter what I did I must never run away or hide again.

"Tell mother," she said to me as I nestled against her comfy shoulder; "she'll understand!"

TELL mother—she'll understand! That's the great big fact that makes mother-love so beautiful and sacred—so very near to the love of God! A mother will understand—almost always. She will understand. Tell her!

THERE are thousands, maybe millions, of boys and girls who have run away to hide—half in fear, half in regret, half in dismay. Maybe they've broken something just as I broke the tea-set. Maybe the breaking of it has been accidental—perhaps it hasn't been. Maybe the something broken is a home or a bank, or a set of good morals, or a heart. Maybe it's something that can be replaced, maybe it's something that can be mended, maybe it's something that will always stay broken.

And yet, even though the broken something may never be replaced, or never mended, there's some one who will suffer untold agonies of fear and worry if you run away to hide somewhere in the dusty vastness of the world. There's some one who will wonder whether you have enough to eat and warm clothes to wear. On rainy days some one will hope that you're keeping your feet dry—on snowy nights some one will hope that you have winter flannels on. At twilight, perhaps, some one will sit by the lonely window and peer out through the thickening dusk and pray for a step—your step—on the front walk. There's always some one who will suffer if you run away from your broken life, and hide.

Perhaps some of you, who read this, are mothers—mothers who have a son or a daughter off somewhere—a son or a daughter who doesn't write. Perhaps the wanderer may have run away in the dead of night, fearful of the shadow behind him, but perhaps he went out proudly, valiantly, in search of fortune and fame. And I know, if any of you mothers do read this, that you'll echo the words of the little poem, with me, and say:

"Dear lad—come home!"

AND, maybe, some of you who read this may be wanderers—wanderers who have fled from shame or disappointment or wanderers who didn't find wealth and success and have been ashamed to go home empty-handed. And, if any of you are wanderers, and have a mother back home, remember that she loves you—loves you as a failure even more tenderly than she would have loved you had you been a success.

"Love, peace and hope await you here"—that's what the little poem said. And, wanderers—whoever and wherever you are—it's true, every word of it. There's always peace and love and hope, and usually a new chance, waiting where there's a mother waiting.

And if you read this won't you write to her and say that you'll come home—some day?

Enters a new business at $100,000 a year

The Board of Directors of a gigantic wholesale grocery concern had gathered to select a new president.

A keen, broad-minded director arose and said, "I know the man we want." He named the president of a great National Bank.

"What!" cried one astonished director, "what does a banker know about our business?"

"This man knows more than just banking," was the answer. "He is not limited to any one field." They discussed the matter from all standpoints. Finally they agreed unanimously to get him if they could.

The banker accepted the presidency of the wholesale grocery concern at a salary of $100,000.

He knew business fundamentals

In a surprisingly short time he had completely reorganized the whole concern.

New, well-planned office short cuts replaced the old, roundabout methods.

The former sluggish sales force was snapped into a wide awake, powerful organization with a capacity to secure an enormously increased business.

The inspiring success of this banker, in a business totally new to him, was the result of his broad business training. His greatness lay in his knowledge of business fundamentals.

It is this broad grasp of the fundamentals of business and the application of them to the individual case that the Alexander Hamilton Institute is giving to more than 40,000 business men today.

The Modern Business Course and Service of the Alexander Hamilton Institute gives you a logical foundation on which to build your future business knowledge and experience. All departments of business are covered—and presented to you in interesting, practical form.

The kind of men enrolled

Presidents of big corporations are often enrolled for the Modern Business Course and Service along with ambitious young clerks in their employ. Among the 40,000 subscribers are such men as: H. C. Osborn, President, American Multigraph Sales Co.; Melville W. Mix, President of the Dodge Mfg. Co., a $1,500,000 corporation; Geo. M. Verity, President of the American Rolling Mills, a $5,000,000 corporation; Wm. H. Ingersoll, Marketing Manager of the biggest watch company in the world; N. A. Hawkins, General Sales Manager of the Ford Motor Co.—and scores of others equally prominent.

Advisory Council

Business and educational authority of the highest standing is represented in the Advisory Council of the Alexander Hamilton Institute. This Council includes Frank A. Vanderlip, President of the National City Bank; Judge E. H. Gary, head of the U. S. Steel Corporation; John Hays Hammond, the eminent engineer; Joseph French Johnson, Dean of the New York University School of Commerce, and Jeremiah W. Jenks, the statistician and economist.

"Commit thy way unto Jehovah; trust all in him"

Suppose you were traveling through an unknown part of the country, hastening to a certain destination, and on coming to a place where five different roads met, you found the sign-post with the five pointing fingers lying in the ditch, what would you do? The difficulty would be to know which finger belonged to which road. Your hesitation, however, would not last long, because you would take up the broken head of the sign-post, and place it in such a position that the finger bearing the name of the town or village you had left should assume its right position of pointing along the road you had traversed. You would then be certain that your dumb guide spoke truly of the other four. So in life, we are constantly coming to cross-roads, and are in doubt as to which to take. At such a moment we must roll (see margin) our way on Jehovah and trust in him. We have come from him, and when we adjust ourselves to our starting-point we shall be in no long suspense as to our destination. Four things indicate our course: the impression on our heart, the Word of God, the advice of one true and wise friend, and the corroboration of circumstances. When three shore-lights stand in line as one, the steersman, at a port I know, is sure that he is in line for the harbor-mouth, though there is no moon to light his course. If you do not know which way to take, stand sill till you do: or if you must act, use your common sense, asking God to illuminate it, throw on him the responsibility of stopping you, and go on. Even if you land in difficulties, they do not prove you to be wrong, but that any other road would have been impossible.

Critical Points in a Stormy Trip

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WHAT a versatile writer St. Luke was! We find so great a critic of literature as Renan calling his Gospel "the most beautiful book in the world." We ourselves have been studying his biography of Paul, his sketch of the rise of the early church, his reports of the trials. Now we find him penning one of the best accounts of ancient seafaring. It is odd that a famous man of like sounding name, Lucian, gives us a close parallel sixty years later. In his dialogue, "The Ship," he describes the adventures of a grain ship in the Mediterranean and a storm at sea.

Ancient Seamanship

THIS is a great chapter for the boys. I remember with joy a certain night with a group of boys of our church in camp on a little island in the midst of a lake, when they listened to chapter after chapter of the Acts. It was this part that first caught their interest, and we were using that fine boys' version, "The Twentieth Century New Testament." We discussed the difficulties of sailing then, beyond those of today. Then, there was one great mast and one square unmanageable sail, giving a strain so great that in a gale the sailors must undergird the ship (verse 17). They had no compass, without which we would not venture into the big woods, and without the stars (verse 20) they lost all sense of direction. Besides, the boat was small compared with those of the present, and had a large crowd on board with poor accommodations (verse 37). So we excused their timidity in hugging the shore (verse 13).

The Voyage of Life

IN olden times and today the voyage of life has always had its critical points. We are all on its great sea and sailing on to unseen shores. There are calm, beautiful days, safe harbors, soft winds. There are also stormy seasons, dangerous coasts, mighty tempests. So we boys began to pick out the verses of this chapter which give striking warning signals and enlightening pictures of our spiritual voyage. Perhaps some boys and girls who read this can find many more, for it is one of the most vivid and meaningful passages of Scripture to the imaginative reader.

I. Contrary Winds (verse 4)

SOME lives look easy to the outside world, with every advantage and comfort. Others seem desperate from the first, with constant struggle against poverty and sickness and trouble. Yet after all it is probably true that most of us, sooner or later, encounter those days when "the winds are contrary." Did you ever read the biography of a great man who had not had this experience? Chapter 17 of Acts is a type of all great careers. No boy or girl should fear the handicaps of life after the object lesson of marvelous Helen Keller, deaf, dumb and blind to begin with, yet sailing on to useful service. The non-Christian world may be compared to an ancient sailing vessel struggling on in this changeful sea. But Christ has given us a chart and a compass, a dynamic power and a high purpose, that make our Christian kingdom a modern steamship with a hull of steel and a heart of fire. With our pilot on board, and our Bible-chart before us, we need only grasp the wheel more resolutely when the contrary winds begin to blow.

II. Unh eded Advice (verse 10)

IF the captain of the Alexandrian grain-ship had heeded Paul's advice he would not have lost both his vessel and his cargo. But he foolishly sought a larger harbor and a more interesting city to spend the winter in. The centurion, who had the casting vote, listened respectfully to Paul, but decided to fall in with the self-interest of the captain who sought comfort and the owner who sought gain. And yet as a matter of simple fact they were running against experience (verse 9) which made that sea dangerous in October. The experience of the past is a safe guide for the young people of today as they feel inclined to take risks like this—with drink or pleasure or money-getting. It is the part of wisdom to listen to good advice and heed it, instead of buying one's own experience at a high cost. Paul was not afraid, but he knew the facts. Three times he had been shipwrecked before this (II Cor. 11 : 25), and on one of these occasions he had spent a night in the water. We ought to listen to the men who have been through before.

III. Falling in with the Crowd (verse 12)

"THE more part advised to put to sea from thence, if by any means they could reach Phœnix." In other words, the crowd wanted to take a chance. Did you ever notice that a crowd is more daring than an individual? A bunch of boys will do things that not one boy in the lot would do alone. It's so with men, too. A mob will shout oaths, destroy property or commit murder, though the members of it in cool blood would condemn such acts. We need the old command of Exodus, "Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil." The temptation is strong. Falling in with the crowd, lowering your standards, forgetting your ideals. "Everybody's doing it" does not excuse the consecrated disciple of the Christ.

How foolish to sail a ship by majority vote! The majority is so often wrong. The voice of the people is not always the voice of God. Christians should take no shame but rather pride when, like Daniel, they stand alone. In an old story of the early church, some one says to Athanasius, the uncompromising: "Athanasius, the world is against you." That invincible, militant spirit re-

IV. Disregarding Storm Signals (verse 13)

"THE south wind blew softly." But this is well known among seamen to be a weather-breeder and too fickle to be trusted at all. Yet they supposed they had obtained their purpose. How natural, yet how unwise! There are so many soft, delusive south winds in life—things that are so easy, so enjoyable to the senses, so suspiciously alluring. Before we realize it we have ventured too far and the after-storm is upon us. Then our ignorance and folly do not shield us from the suffering and shipwreck that follow. The girls who have read "Adam Bede" will remember the story of Hetty Sorrel, and it has been the story of countless thousands.

The ancients had an allegory of the sirens who sang seductively to the sailors. Listening to the songs, they neglected their tasks until they found themselves suddenly on the rocks. Even those of us who avoid some great folly and blasting sin may gradually be lured from our true course by seemingly harmless amusement and fascinating company until we have missed our goal and failed of our high purposes.

V. The Tempest (verse 20)

WHAT a mighty tempest has broken over the millions of Europe in our time—loved ones killed, homes wrecked, country in danger! How sore is the need of the storm-tossed world! Yet every soul God has made has found, sooner or later, "no small tempest" in life. It may be fierce and fiery temptation to open sin. It may be awful physical pain or long-enduring sickness. It may be a battle against injustice or poverty that impends over those who are most dear. How dark the sky looks, "nor stars for many days," and "all hope taken away."

Now it does not matter how black things are. Whether in grief or failure, doubt or despair, it is well for us to know that other souls have come through safe. "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man; but God is faithful who will make a way of escape that ye may be able to bear it." We cannot see this in the present stress, but we can cling to the hope that "all things work together for good." We can pray on as Paul did, though no one knew he was praying. We can hold fast, grimly, to our remnants of faith. In the midst of the storm at sea, there is something greater than the angry mountainous waves, the crashing thunder and the roaring gale, and that is the indomitable spirit of the captain on the bridge, sleepless, vigilant, never surrendering. "I am the captain of my soul."

VI. An Angel in the Storm (verse 23)

WHILE some were sitting by in stark, sullen despair, waiting for death, and others less daunted were tugging at the undergirding of the ship, Paul stood forth the master of the situation. To his eyes of faith, there had appeared in the darkness of the night an angel in the storm with the assurance of God: "All's well." A vision, confirming to him God's purpose unchanged for him "to stand before Cæsar" and for the safety of all the people in the ship. And it is true in the deep symbolic sense, that everywhere in the dark scenes of life the men of the Spirit have perceived angels in the midst of the tempest, pointing the way, assuring that God still rules above.

VII. A Dominating Personality on Board

HAVE you noticed how gradually the Jewish prisoner-of-state had become the dominant figure on the ship? In one day (verse 3) he had won the confidence of Captain Julius and was given leave of absence. At the Fair Havens (verse 10) the centurion gave more heed to the master and the owner, but gave Paul a hearing. In the tempest Paul becomes the center of hope and good cheer. And when the sailors would desert Paul takes command, and the soldiers obey him.

How do you show up before your fellow men in a testing-time? As a fearless, avowed soldier of the Lord Jesus Christ? Or as one who has no comfort to bring, no pilot on board, no God to trust, no angel in the storm?

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

How to Get All Working

ONCE in six weeks an Atchison, Kan., superintendent varies his Scripture reading by an experience meeting. He plans ten one-minute talks by ten people, old, middle-aged and young. He sends to ten such people a letter like this:

> Dear Friend:
>
> At the Scripture reading period of next Sunday morning's school, I am planning to have ten people to give testimonies of one minute. Tell of your love of Jesus, of your love of Christian work—of any Christian experience you may have had. Only be sure don't take more than one minute, for ten experiences of one minute each will mean ten minutes. Don't fail me. I am depending on you. Your number will be —.
> H. P. ARMSTRONG, Supt.

No wonder they have a rousing spiritual time. Mr. Armstrong calls no names. He asks for the numbers and the persons respond. He uses the same plan for Bible readings. He hands ten persons notes reading as follows:

> Dear Friend:
>
> For our Scripture lesson I want ten people each to select a verse in the Bible, and when I call your number stand and read. Your number will be —. H. P. ARMSTRONG, Supt.

Sometimes Mr. Armstrong hands out ten prayers that he has written, numbered also. Then he calls for them and they read their sentence prayer. This trains them to pray.

No wonder that school has the remarkable record of having all its scholars members of the church with the exception of one or two. They do not attend the school long before they are solicited to profess Christ.

IN the city of Abilene, Kan., with 5,000 people and thirteen churches, is the Brethren in Christ Church, known popularly as the River Brethren, a conservative type of Pennsylvania German, with a membership of 130 and a Sunday school enrolment of 147, exclusive of the Cradle Roll and Home Department.

For many years they were accustomed to a Sunday school session at 9.30 A. M., concluding at 10.45 with a readjustment for the church service, which closed at about 12. Under the old plan the sermons were often as much as 45 to 50 minutes long. Quiet but persistent protest against the apparent necessity for a long sermon, and growing dissatisfaction with the increasing absence of young people from the preaching hour, were among the reasons that led to the change. Under the previous arrangement the Sunday school had a preliminary service of song, fellowship and miscellany, occupying the first thirty minutes, and forty minutes for class room work. For a year or more the general "review" has been eliminated, with unquestioned benefit and with the general approval of all persons concerned.

Now, the school continues to meet strictly at 9.30, the scholars going directly to their respective six department rooms, where, under the direction of the department superintendent, exactly one hour is devoted to the exercises and lesson. These department programs are arranged by the respective heads with reference to the age, aptitudes and interests of the scholars.

In less than two minutes' time, the school has reassembled, children sitting with their parents for a common service, which is at once the closing of the Sunday school and the opening of the church service. Pastor, superintendent and chairman of the Church Board collaborate in these thirty minutes with the view of eliminating the dividing line between "Sunday school" and "church." This period includes a popular song service, announcements, and discreet allusion to the financial and statistical data upon the blackboard, showing the standing by departments. It also includes special musical numbers, remarks such as seem germane to the occasion and to the day; also the Scripture reading and prayer, the theory being that at 11 o'clock the minister stands in his place for the sermon, which now rarely exceeds twenty-eight or thirty minutes. With a very brief closing service the congregation is dismissed about 11.35.

With the exception of those who worship tradition and dislike change on general principles, the revised procedure seems highly satisfactory. The number of the persons retiring at the close of the Bible study has been reduced almost to the zero point, which is the best indication of its success.

The Christian Herald Prayer Leagu

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE World's Evangelical Alliance has sent us its usual invitation for the annual universal week of prayer, which has been observed by many Christians throughout the world for over half a century. The week from Sunday, December 31, 1916, to Saturday, January 6, 1917 (both days included), is one in which all Christians of every denomination are earnestly urged to unite their prayers that the world may repent and turn to God; that the Church of Christ may be strengthened; that righteousness and the spirit of brotherhood may spread throughout the earth; that the Gospel may have free course, and that individuals, communities and nations may be drawn into the kingdom of righteousness. This is a request to which every member of the Prayer League should give attention. It will be observed in many churches, but it can also be remembered in other gatherings and in our home and individual prayers. We commend the request to every member of the Prayer League.

Many acknowledgments of answered prayer have come to the League during the last week, some of them being quite remarkable as illustrating the power of prevailing prayer.

A reader in Medford, Ore., writes that the request sent to the League for prayers for a revival in that place has met with glorious response. "Many have been brought to Christ, and a great deal of good has been done. Thanks be to God!"

From Tennessee comes this brief note of spiritual cheer: "The Lord has heard the prayers for the Mumford church. May we be remembered still."

A lady in Seattle, Wash., writes: "I wish to express my gratitude in behalf of answered prayer for my son. Today I received a letter from him saying he is well. I thank God for his goodness."

A lady in Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "Some time ago I requested the prayers of the League for my restoration to health. God has answered their prayers and I am gaining every day."

A League Member in Charlton City, Mass., gratefully acknowledges answered prayer for a mother's recovery.

A Roseland, Neb., reader joyfully acknowledges answered prayer for a revival in that place, and adds: "Praise God, he has been with us the whole year."

A lady in New York reverently acknowledges answered prayer for the restoration to health of her son and herself.

E. G. gratefully acknowledges the wonderful improvement in mental condition of a gifted friend in answer to prayer.

A friend in Woburn, Mass., writes: "An answered prayer made a great impression upon me during the Civil War. I was ten years old, a brother three years older, one two years younger, a sister seven years younger. Father in the army, mother had to face hardship, strong in the strength that was promised. That morning she had given us our breakfast, and when we had finished I think she must have been very discouraged, it was so unusual for her to speak like this: 'Well, children, I don't know what you will have for dinner. I have absolutely nothing.' I well remember how we children bewailed the condition, until I fancy mother could stand it no longer. She left us and went away to another room. Coming back after a little, her face was radiant. We were all asking: 'Mother, has the dinner come?' 'Not yet, but it will.' 'How do you know?' 'Well, children, I have asked our Father for it, and it will be here in time. Now don't say any more about it.' Toward the dinner hour, a man who was in the fish business came to the door and said to mother: 'I owed your husband forty cents. I can give you the money, if you'd rather; but I was impelled to bring this sh.' Mother replied: 'I was waiting f it.' The afternoon mail brought a tter with money from father that had een delayed. I surely believe in ans red prayer."

A brother's recovery and release rom the liquor habit in answer to yer comes to us from Yorkville, Tenn

A friend in New London, (nn., writes: "I know that it was nly through prayer and faith that I ave my present position, which is one the best in this city, and also th ugh prayer that I found a way thro h a very serious and trying expe nce, lasting over a period of about four ars. It is really miraculous, the way G has silently brought about an adjustm t of serious problems against strong o osition."

A lady in Folsom, Calif., send this remarkable experience: "I sent a request for prayers. It was a case life or death. I was surprised whe the answer came. My whole life uld have been spoilt if I had not g an answer to the prayers of those ear ones."

ra linary in the sense of being apparent totally devoid of military reason, anc a flagrant violation of all the rules of art of war.

e Rumanians forced a passage of the anube between the fortified towns of stchuk and Turtukai, constructed pon on bridges across the river, and suc ssfully passed a small force of abc 15,000 men over to the southern or lgarian shore.

is passage had hardly been accompli d when Austrian monitors moving dow the Danube from the west destr ed the pontoon bridges, on which the troops had crossed, and took up a pos on btween them and the Rumanian ore, thus preventing retreat across the anube. The unfortunate Rumanian attalions on the Bulgarian shore, wit no means of departing therefrom, we then simultaneously attacked from eas west and south by superior forces of Bu rs and practically destroyed.

ther west, the Bulgars have begu movement from Vidin which may, tho h that is doubtful, develop into an inv ion of Rumania from the northwe and have seized an island in the Da be from whence they are bombarding e Rumanian town of Kalafat on the st bank of the river. Probably this wil urn out to be merely a diversion to im bilize a Rumanian force on this fro the northern front on Saturday, Sep mber 30, a disaster of magnitude bef the Rumanians in the center, one wh consequences to them will be farrea ing, if not completely adversely decis to their operations on the Transyl nian front.

e Rumanians were on both sides of He annstadt endeavoring to capture tha important town. Behind them to the uth, 15 miles away, was the pass, the Rothenthurm, through hills from 3,0 to 5,000 feet high, through which the had poured northward. The Teuto protecting Hermannstadt, displa d enough activity to keep the Ruma ns trying to take the place, and wh this was going on another Teutonic for moving from a point to the west of He annstadt, went through the mountai by another pass and then moved eas ard parallel to the chain until it rea ed the Rothenthurm directly behin the Rumanian army operating arc d Hermannstadt. Then when bot Teutonic armies were thus in positio the northern one, casting aside all dis ise as to its strength, suddenly adva ed south against the enemy, while sin taneously a portion of the Teutonic arr in the Rothenthurm advanced nor , the result being that the Rumanian rmy attempting to take Hermannsta ceased to exist as an army, and its sur vors are now picking their way in gro s through the mountains to the eas nd west of Rothenthurm.

this battle the Rumanians are estima d to have lost over an army corps, an artillery and munitions of war in pro ortion. The Austro-German army as e week closes is on Rumanian soil to south of Rothenthurm Pass.

On their northeastern front, in extreme eastern Transylvania, the Rumanians held their own and a little more the most of the week, but toward the end seemed to be wavering. The early part of the period under consideration the Russian front was very quiet, but about the middle of the week General Brussiloff opened a new effort in Volhynia to progress towards Kovel, and in Galicia from the northeast and the east and southeast to draw nearer to Lemberg.

The movement began on Monday, when the Russians made several attacks, after artillery preparation, on the lines held by General Tersztansky's army, but in vain. The next day Russian troops were hurled in huge masses on the Teutonic lines, time after time, without the slightest regard for losses. Wednesday's fighting was even fiercer than Tuesday's and equally fruitless. The next day the attacks continued the same. The Russians appear to be attempting to break through here by sheer weight of numbers, and, according to some accounts, they appear short of rifle ammunition.

In northeastern Galicia a hard battle took place on Saturday near Graberka, which the Russians won, gaining considerable ground and taking a thousand prisoners, but on Monday the Teutons returned to the charge and assuming the offensive drove the Russians out of and beyond the positions captured by them Saturday, and took some 2,500 prisoners. After this, the fighting here degenerated into skirmishes.

Farther south, on the Zlota Lipa, hard fighting took place nearly all the week, and on the balance the Russians gained, but farther southwest in the Haliez region lost a little ground. In the Carpathians and in southern Bukowina the fighting was of a very minor order. So little and such fragmentary news reached us from the Caucasus the past week that nothing can be said concerning that campaign.

None of the minor campaigns contributed much to the news of the week. All seems reasonably quiet in the Suez region and in Egypt, and nothing was heard from the fighting in German East Africa.

In Macedonia the only real effort by the Allies is being made around Florina and between that town and Monastir. In this sector the Allies have made some gains, some of which appear to be of real importance as bearing upon their effort to reach Monastir.

The names of the several villages captured would perhaps be of no interest or significance to most of my readers, so that it will be intelligible to sum up the week's results by saying that the Allies have during the week advanced about three miles on their whole front in this region and are now at a point about half way between Florina and Monastir. After the first half of the remaining way is covered, the Bulgars will probably abandon the town and retreat to the mountains immediately behind the city, as the city itself is not a strong defensive point.

Forecasting a Trade War with Europe

PRESIDENT WILSON in his campaign addresses has painted in optimistic colors the American outlook for foreign trade. In his recent speech at Baltimore he has pictured this country as taking the foremost place in the great field of commerce in "a new spirit which the world has never seen before; not the spirit of those who would exclude others, but the spirit of those who would excel others. I want to see America pitted against the world not in selfishness, but in brains."

There are many, however, who are perhaps even better qualified to speak with authority on this subject because of their familiarity with all the details of our foreign commerce, who take a totally different view of the American prospects after the war. With the caution born of long years of experience, they see in our present temporary trade advantages conditions which can hardly fail to react to our disadvantage later. When the war ends, and Europe sets about its task of commercial reconstruction in earnest, it will then be seen that all the belligerents will be ready to make common cause to wrest back, through the competition of commerce, as much as possible of the tremendous gains which the neutral countries have made out of the war.

How such commercial alliances may be expected to affect the trade status of neutrals generally, and especially of the United States—which has been the greatest gainer by the war—is set forth in a booklet just issued by the National Foreign Trade Council, a representative organization with its headquarters in New York and its membership in all the leading cities. They are not foreigners but Americans, and the banks and corporations of which they are the official heads include practically all of the largest, wealthiest and most influential organizations in the country. We need only name a few of them to convince any one who has a sufficiently open mind of the standing of the men who differ with the President's highly colored prognostications on the outlook for our foreign trade:

James A. Farrell, President United States Steel Corporation, New York City.
E. A. S. Clarke, President Lackawanna Steel Company, New York City.
Samuel P. Colt, President United States Rubber Company, New York City.
Maurice Coster, Managing Director Westinghouse Electric Export Company, New York City.
John Crosby, Washburn-Crosby Company, Minneapolis, Minn.
Robert Dollar, President the Robert Dollar Company, San Francisco, Cal.
P. A. S. Franklin, Vice-President International Mercantile Marine, New York City.
Lloyd C. Griscom, New York City.
Fairfax Harrison, President Southern Railway Company, Washington, D. C.
Louis W. Hill, Chairman Great Northern Railway Company, St. Paul, Minn.
Charles E. Jennings, President C. E. Jennings Company, New York City.
Alba B. Johnson, President Baldwin Locomotive Works, Philadelphia Pa.
D. W. Kempner, Galveston Cotton Exchange, Galveston, Texas.
Cyrus H. McCormick, President International Harvester Corporation, Chicago, Ill.
J. R. McWane, President American Cast Iron Pipe Company, Birmingham, Ala.
H. C. Lewis, General Manager National Paper and Type Company, New York City.
Charles H. Muchnic, Vice-President American Locomotive Sales Corporation, New York City.
Barton Myers, President Chamber of Commerce, Norfolk, Va.
M. A. Oudin, Foreign Manager General Electric Company, Schenectady, N. Y.
John D. Ryan, President Anaconda Copper Mining Company, New York City.
W. L. Saunders, Chairman of Board Ingersoll-Rand Company, New York City.
Charles A. Schieren, President Charles A. Schieren Company, New York City.
Wallace D. Simmons, President Simmons Hardware Company, St. Louis, Mo.
Willard Straight, Vice-President American International Corporation, New York City.
G. F. Sulzberger, Sulzberger & Sons Company, Chicago, Ill.
F. A. Vanderlip, President National City Bank, New York City.

For many months past it has been evident to these men, who are at the head of the nation's largest enterprises, that Europe would leave nothing undone to get back from America the millions and billions of gold that have poured into this country during the two years past, and which have nearly drained the treasuries of Europe dry. This coming day of reckoning has not even been hinted at in the President's speeches, but the business leaders of America know better. They look forward to a hostile combination of powerful forces, embracing practically all of Europe and the greater part of Asia, which will begin a tremendous struggle to deprive us of our supremacy in foreign trade, and to turn the golden tide back to Europe whence it came.

In the pamphlet of the National Foreign Trade Council, the plan for restoring Europe's shattered trade is outlined in these words:

> The Economic Alliance of the Entente Powers, agreed upon at the Paris Economic Conference, June 14-17, 1916, and the discussion of a similar alliance among the Central Powers, reveal a disposition to substitute a system of trade preferences for the most-favored-nation relation upon which the commercial intercourse of Europe rested prior to the war. This relationship dominated the commerce of the world, into which, by virtue of its most-favored-nation treaty relations with the great commercial and industrial nations, the United States fitted to the great advantage, profit, and prosperity of the American people.
>
> How far will "war after war" obtain?
>
> Since the United States, in the last normal year before the war (1913), sent 77.61 per cent. of its exports to the belligerent countries and their colonies and derived from them 72.83 per cent. of its imports, any sweeping change of tariff, navigation, or financial policy on the part of either group of allies, and particularly upon the part of the Entente Allies, may seriously affect the domestic prosperity of the United States, in which foreign trade is a vital element. To British countries alone went half the total value of United States exports and from them were derived one-third of the imports. The excess of exports over imports in the two fiscal years ended June 30, 1916 (twenty-two months of which were occupied by war), gave the United States a favorable trade balance of $3,230,133,362. Since the European governments were unable to pay for these purchases in merchandise, they have surrendered gold until the gold reserve in the United States has far exceeded all records and supports a structure of domestic and foreign credit unprecedented in the history of the world.
>
> The recovery of a portion of this gold reserve is essential to the restoration of European prosperity after the war, and this would logically seem to be one effect of the economic alliances now being devised and the plans being laid for a more intensive competition which will bring back the trade which, by the curtailment of European production and competition, has given American merchandise a greater access to European markets and a larger share of the trade of neutral countries. A violent reversal of the flow of gold would rudely disturb the structure of domestic bank credits reared upon it.
>
> The primary safeguard must be a stimulation of exports of the merchandise required in peace to take the place of the abnormal demand and prices for munitions and an abnormal export of other articles. A diminution of our present inflated export trade is inevitable, but the danger is that European cooperation and trade preferences may be carried so far as artificially to restrain American foreign trade and carry it below our normal equity in world commerce.

Very significant is this statement dealing with differential tariffs which may be expected to be leveled against our commerce:

> If the members of either the Entente or Central Economic Alliance seek by differential tariff duties to prefer each other and their respective colonies, a discrimination against the products of the United States will automatically be created.
> If special shipping arrangements are carried so far as artificially to create lower rates for allied than for neutral commerce, the parity of ocean freight charges to and from American ports as compared with to and from European ports, which has been one cause of toleration of American dependence upon foreign carriers, will be disturbed.

Every phase of the coming trade war seems to have been considered by these financial and commercial magnates, even to the resources at our disposal with which to fight the coming battle to save our foreign trade. The old world trade alliance will develop their own sources of raw materials; they will

Our present tariff law ds as barren of resources either cession or retaliation. It urges ation among American business cope with Europe in the coming struggle. Our exporters must be left free to combine for all the exigencies they are sure to meet.

These foreshadowings of the commercial war to be waged throughout the globe after the military war are not confined to our own land. They are common talk among the business men of Europe, and the expressions found in many of the foreign commercial journals serve fair warning to Americans to prepare for a bitter trade warfare "when the belligerents of today become the commercial rivals of tomorrow." Fairplay, one of the leading shipping journals of England, has this very outspoken paragraph, which finds many echoes:

> America so far has evaded the fight, but she is bound to recognize two things: First, that the nations who win this war, whether they be the Allies or the Central Powers, will not be in a temper to stand any nonsense from any neutrals: that the winning combatant countries will represent the main armed forces of the world, and that no one else will be in the running. Secondly, America will appreciate that the Allies intend, where it pays them to do so, to put up a tariff wall between themselves and neutrals. They mean to restore themselves and to become self-supporting—at some expense it may be while the operation lasts, but certainly not for the benefit of neutrals.

The "Gems from the Bible" "Reply Book" were offered as nience to those who wish to have but the contest was so arranged that any one could participate without expense and share in the awards if merited. It was required that those who did not submit answers in Reply Books should make a drawing of each picture on a single sheet of paper and write below the drawing the verses selected as answers. We were certainly gratified to receive hundreds of sets of answers with the pictures thus drawn. Many of these were exceedingly well done and would have merited praise if executed by an artist. We were particularly impressed with a set of answers that came from Quebec, Canada. This contestant prepared a neat 60-page book of antique paper, 5½ by 8 inches. The pages were punched and bound with narrow red ribbon. Each picture was creditably drawn at the top of the page and the verses written below. To prevent the drawings from becoming smeared, pieces of tissue paper were inserted between the pages. This booklet of answers was made immensely striking by an attractive cover, lettered in gold ink, and gold ink was also used in writing the verses throughout the booklet.

Although women th America do not live the se- lives of their sisters in India, ocial and educational limitations the visiting missionary very he as a rule. This branch of work reat importance and might well ch more fully developed than at t, particularly in the direction of women trained by women.

rs of experience in Peru and a residence in Chile leads one to look upon the work of house-to-house visitation as most effectual in gaining the confidence of the women in their own houses, of opening doors for conversation, breaking down prejudice and instilling new ideas. Sympathy with their sorrows, interest in their interests, a woman among women may come to be regarded as a sister and friend.

"What makes you love the Book so? Did you write it?" we have been asked. "Come again soon and tell us more of the blessed words." "I have longed all my life to have the words and doings of the Lord Jesus—now you have brought them to me and I am so glad." "We were always taught that the Bible was a bad book, but it has shown me how the chains of sin may be broken. Now I know that God has pardoned me for Jesus' sake." Such are some of the words that flow from the hearts of our warm-hearted South American sisters.

Though the work is still in its infancy there are many things that encourage. "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." All we can aim at just at present is to teach the women a right attitude toward their home duties as wives and mothers. To speak of what this leads to with regard to the destiny of a nation appeals to the imagination of the more intelligent, who can grasp the idea that the home is the seed-plot of the nation, and that the grit, energy and courage of the men of tomorrow must be nurtured in the home of today.

SAXON "SIX"

Repeatedly has Saxon "Six" proved its superiority

Not once but many times has Saxon "Six" shown itself a better car than those that claim rivalry by way of price.

And these repeated proofs have had their effect.

People now seem to know very definitely and decidedly why Saxon "Six" is the best car in its price class.

Evidently they have been comparing Saxon "Six" with others in its class.

And they have usually arrived at the same deliberate opinion—that Saxon "Six" is a far abler performer, a far better car.

Recently another piece of evidence was added to the proof of the economy of Saxon "Six" when 206 Saxon "Sixes" traveled 300 miles apiece without stopping and averaged 23.5 miles per gallon of gasoline.

And proof of its stability and strength is found in the fact that the average cost per car for repair parts over a period of two years is less than $8.50.

We urge your inspection of Saxon "Six" at once—preferably today. Saxon "Six" is $815 f.o.b. Detroit.

Young People's Topics for October

Am I Evading God's Call?

Epworth League Topic. Jonah 1 : 3; Jer. 1 : 6, 7; Exod. 4 : 10-12; Acts 26 : 19.

EVERY person who is saved by grace through the blood of Christ is called of God for definite service. Sometimes we forget this and speak and act as if only ministers, missionaries and deaconesses were favored with the divine leading in the choice of their life work. Two things may be accepted as certain. If God calls us, we cannot evade the duty or avoid his presence without suffering in heart and mind and perhaps in body. This, not because God is vindictive, for we know he is love and of abounding mercy; but because the consciousness of disobedience is an avenging spirit within us. Jonah tried to run away; we know what happened. Again, if God calls us, he will make us able to perform that duty to which he has called us. Moses, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, prophets and priests unnumbered, have gone about their appointed task in physical weakness but in spiritual power, and the will of God has been wrought in and through them. At the end of life what could be more blessed than to be able to say with Paul, "I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision"? But how shall we know whether we are avoiding God's call? It is a question between our own conscience and our God. It can be settled only by prayer and by the complete putting of our life in his hands. He will guide us. He may use human agencies; but beware of that well-meaning person who is always so certain that God is calling some one else to service. Many a promising young Christian life has been driven into a sterile ministry to which it was not called by the flattering assurances of others as to his very evident qualifications and most certain call. And remember always that God calls us, most of us, to be good fathers and mothers, good farmers, good workmen, good citizens.

The Religious Conditions of America

B. Y. P. U. Topic (Conquest Meeting). Ps. 1 : 1-6.

THIS is a broad topic. What are the religious conditions of America? They vary with the population and the neighborhood. There are some conditions, however, that are practically nationwide. In all the nation a little more than one-third of the people are professing Christians—to be exact, 38,662,559 in 1914 out of a population of possibly 105,000,000. But with all this profession, we find empty pews and missionary societies facing opportunities for evangelization in every field which they cannot meet for lack of money, while per capita giving is scarcely one per cent. of the incomes of church members. indifference and lack of consecration c the church at every turn; but on th hand we find a growing spirit of conse a new turning of the people to religiou ing, a new spirit of desire on the par church to modernize itself, to se present age, but to raise aloft even r sistently the old Gospel which in all t has been the center of its life. Look article "The Church and Its Task" Christian Herald for October 4. It i iarly in line with this topic.

Adventures in Oriental English

INSTRUCTING the youth has never been classified as an indoor sport, and yet it is not without a certain amount of adventurous excitement. The still hunt for schoolboy errors adds zest to the daily struggle, especially on the foreign field, where marvelous perversions of English appear in the work of the ambitious lads that flock to the mission schools and colleges.

The idioms of a boy's own language, like playful imps, set snares for him when he ventures afield. Our idioms of motion demand rapid action—our clocks run, our carriages run, so do our steamboats. But in the leisurely Arabic language everything walks instead of running. So the student tells you that he was late to class because his watch stopped walking.

The Arabic, which boasts three separate sounds resembling the English letter h, lacks the equivalent of the letter p. In consequence p and b are often confused. A student who was taking an examination in medieval history once appealed to me in great distress. "Sir, do you spell 'pope'—b-o-p-e, p-o-b-e, or b-o-b-e?"

The late venerable Dr. Bliss of the Syrian Protestant College once entered a classroom where a native teacher was trying in vain to teach a student the difference between p and b. Dr. Bliss undertook the case. Gathering up some chalk-dust in his hand and holding his hand to his lips he spoke to the student.

"Do you see this dust in my hand? When I say b I do not expel my breath, and the chalk-dust stays where it is. But when I say p I blow the dust all away." He did. He blew it all over the enlightened youth.

Frequently the student gets his idea correctly but expresses it in dislocated language. "Let us be captured by God but never by Spain," is the valiant paraphrase of Tennyson's lines: "Fall into the hands of God, not into the hands of Spain." Another pictures this scene on a battlefield: "In the meantime the angel of death was carrying on his work honestly and intelligently." This one reveals an astonishing precocity at birth: "I was born in Jerusalem, and being a child of five years I entered in a school."

The paraphrasing of a passage from some English author often reveals singular interpretations. The following sentence from Irving's Sketch-Book proved a stumbling block to many: "The young Count Von Altenb tranquilly pursuing his route in tha jog-trot way in which a man travels matrimony when his friends have t the trouble and uncertainty of cour his hands, and a bride is waiting for certainly as a dinner at the end of ney."

One lad committed the following young Count was calmly going in t zag way—" and stuck there, leaving utation of the unfortunate count cloud. Another went through to t end: "The youthful Count Von A was quietly following his way in that lofty, jolting gate (sic) in which a m neys toward wedlock or marriage v affectionate companions have destit from the difficulty and doubt of sol in love and a lady whom he had to expecting him to come with a dinner prepared for him at the close of his ex

So the task of instructing the alien somewhat in the nature of a pleasan ture, nor is the enjoyment of the entirely one-sided. The unfortunate has to learn the language of the coun many and many a time will he fur good friends among the native pe material for a pleasant anecdote.

Questions and Answers

A. M. L., Harrison, Mo. I am the mother of six children and Jesus is my Burden-bearer. I should like to hear from several Christian parents who have brought up children in their homes, how they conducted family worship, and especially from those who succeeded in teaching their children to be Christians.

Here is an opportunity for an interchange of methods which might prove a great blessing to many mothers, who, like A. M. L., realize the responsibility of giving their little ones the example and training of a good Christian home. We shall be glad to hear from other mothers who are interested.

Reader, North Dakota. According to the most orthodox construction, only that work which is of necessity or of mercy is justifiable on the Lord's Day. It might happen that in a great emergency where serious loss impended (as in a threatened disaster to crops, or the urgent need of raising up a barrier against flood) there would be justification for work; but it can be set down as a general rule that all kinds of labor which can and should be performed on week days should cease on the Lord's Day. This does not apply to gainful operations only, but to a great deal of domestic drudgery which should be avoided on the Sabbath.

N. F. N., Sharon, Mass. There are competitions that are laudable and others that are the reverse. It may be said in a general way that any competition that stimulates the nobler faculties, and helps to broaden the mind and strengthen the intellect, is a deserving one. The fact that others may be engaged in the same quest is rather encouraging than the reverse; for where many are actively participating in a laudable enterprise, the spirit of emulation is good for all. You say you are troubled by the question, "Is it right for me to do what, if I should win, would bring disappointment to many others?" We certainly do not think you would be right to rejoice over the discomfiture or disappointment of others, and if you entered under circumstances that gave you any undue advantage over others, then it would be discreditable and unworthy. However, we cannot say that any such consideration need apply in the present instance. You remember the beautiful passage in which Paul likens the spiritual life to a race in which "all run, but one receiveth the prize" (I Cor. 9 : 24). It is so in all of our lives. If we are headed right it is a contest in which there is mutual helpfulness and not a trace of selfishness, while exultation over the failure of others is impossible.

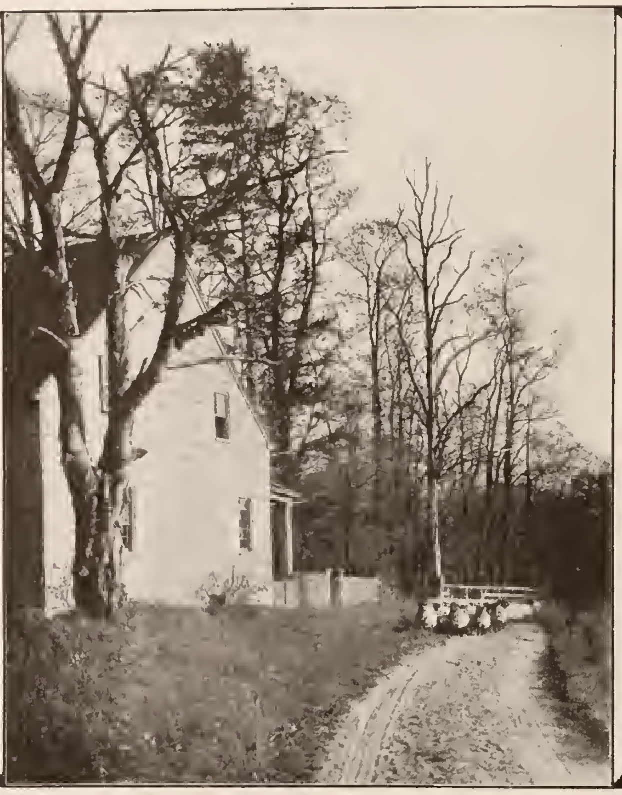
J. C. McK., London, Ky., writes: "In your September 13 Mail-Bag, I notice the trouble of your Georgia subscriber over the passage in I Cor. 15 : 29, 'baptized for the dead.' If he will translate the Greek preposition by the phrase, 'in the name of' (which is allowed by any good lexicon), then the difficulty vanishes. This chapter, as is well known, contains Paul's great argument for the resurrection. If there is no resurrection, then Christ is not risen, and his followers, who have been baptized in his name, have really been 'baptized in the name of the dead,' and therefore their baptism is of no avail."

A. N. L., Pittston, Pa. Is betting gambling?

Betting has been defined as the staking of a pledge—money or its equivalent—on an uncertain issue or event. Whatever form it may take, it is a species of gambling. The colloquial expression, "I bet you," in most cases means nothing more than an assurance of one's confidence in his own opinion on some matter under discussion. It is slang and should be avoided.

Reader, Round Lake, N. Y. Not in our collections. Write to Librarian, Mercantile Library, New York.

Inquirer, Upland, Calif. Confusion sometimes arises concerning the apparent conflict of statement in the passage in I John 1 : 8 and 3 : 9. In the first of these, every unregenerate one is represented as sinning, and in the latter it is clearly stated that "whoso is born of God cannot sin." The first refers to the condition before the redeeming work of grace, the second to the state of the redeemed. One who is sanctified lives each day the life that is daily reconsecrated. Luther writes of it: "The child of God receives wounds daily and never throws away his arms, or makes peace with his deadly foe." A Christian's life is a continual warfare against sin, but he is kept by divine power from falling, although if he even momentarily permit his spiritual weapons to lie idle, he will feel the sharp attack of sin. The ruling principle of his life is God's law, but the old nature may sometimes rebel. See "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" for a fuller discussion.



HOME O' DREAMS

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

MY feet had wandered, weary, from off the beaten way,
And I was worn with working, discouraged, too, that day;
And there it stood, all smiling and lit with sunset gleams,
The home that I had prayed for, my little home o' dreams.

I'd passed the last white turnstile, the last long field aglow,
And somehow it seemed fragrant with hopes I used to know;
And I could see a figure with ribbons in her hair
Stand out against the twilight, and bid me welcome there.

Was it a week, I wonder, or many bitter years
Since last I saw her standing? . . . My eyes are dim with tears.
It looks just like it used to, and yet, somehow, it seems
To miss her as I miss her—Oh, little home o' dreams!

A Brother, Jackson, Miss., writes that what the world needs is "eight hours to sleep, eight to work, and eight to pray." The wisest division of our daily lives has long been a subject of discussion, and we think there are many who would differ with "Brother." In the first place, more than half the world is so situated economically that it cannot control time conditions. We recall two stanzas on this subject. The first, by some statesman or philosopher, says:

Six hours to sleep,
  To law's grave study six;
Ten to the world allot,
  The rest to nature fix.

And the other, quoting from memory:

Seven hours to nature's book,
  To soothing slumber seven;
Ten to the world allot,
  And all to heaven.

We fear that neither stanza would be regarded by most people as suitable for general application, even if any considerable number had the power or the privilege of apportioning their time. But we have the privilege of prayer, and each morning we can confidently ask divine guidance in performing the duties of the day, and at its close we can commit ourselves again to God's care and ask that all our imperfections may be forgiven for the sake of Him who was sinless and perfect. What we ask will not be denied.

Subscriber, North Carolina. We cannot undertake to answer questions based on spiritualistic allegations. However, we can answer the questions at large. The facts about God are so much bigger than the brain of an that we cannot be expected in our present h an state to comprehend them. Christians fe by experience that God is their Father, that C ist is their divine Saviour, and that the Holy rit is their Comforter, Sanctifier and Strength er.

F. S., Front Royal, Va. 1. It would be ch better if your friend put the temptation away m his home altogether and thus did not ha to face the daily danger of relapsing into sin. He is making a strong, good fight and with I's help will finally succeed in overcoming ly. If he fights bravely, God certainly will not ge him harshly. 2. The origin of evil has always en a mystery. Paul, in common with the peo of his time, had a firm belief in the interferen of Satanic influence in human life. In I T ss. 2 : 18 and II Cor. 12 : 7 he refers to it. Y if these temptations, vexations and hindra es are accepted as discipline, the result will to strengthen our character. Paul himself said at all things work together for good to them at love God (Rom. 8 : 28).

A. L. M., Belva, W. Va. The Holy Gh is the third person of the Godhead. Christ p n-ised to send the Holy Ghost (John 16 : 7); d, true to that promise, he came. The remar le demonstration which attended his coming o he day of Pentecost (Acts 2) was for a special r-pose and has not been repeated. We hav n-other means by which the Holy Spirit works, z., the Gospel, through which he calls men to C st, enlightens and sanctifies the whole Chri an Church on earth, and keeps it with Jesus C st in the one true faith. This is the Scriptural ay of regeneration and of receiving the Holy G st.

J. H. D., Chandler, N. C. Please explain l. 4 : 1.

The day here mentioned is primarily that o he destruction of Jerusalem, but this will not ex st the meaning, hence the final and full accom h-ment meant is the day of general judgment. is principle of interpretation is not double but c-cessive fulfilment. The abruptness of the n-guage imparts terrible reality to the pic e. The day burns as an oven. This simile re ls one of Matt. 6 : 30, where the grass of the d is said to be cast into the oven, and all the p d and wicked shall be like stubble that sha e burned till neither root nor branch is left; th s, shall be entirely destroyed.

Mrs. L. L. Y., College Park, Ga. Fo al confession of faith, either in public or in pri e, is not essential; but it is peculiar, to say the l t, that one who claims to "believe the Bible an n prayer" should not think it necessary to ma a confession of that belief by attending where e Bible is taught and expounded and where pr er is practiced, to wit, divine services, particularly so if is influence would make for good. But we are not to judge y one. The Lord has his disciples in all places and his influ e is felt by many of whom we do not know. One who beli s in the Bible and in prayer is certainly on the right path, d sooner or later he will be led to join with those who simil y believe. The other question in your letter is controversial

W. M. C., Provost. Please expound Rev. 19 : 11.

The Lord himself is here meant, who comes to bring sa -tion to his own and destruction to his enemies. The hea n is opened and a white horse appears (the same as tha f chapter 6 : 2). He who went forth conquering and to con r (and how can one conquer without battles and wars?) ret s in triumph. His victory is won and he has proved him f "faithful and true," faithful to all his promises and true as e essence of all that is real and everlasting. In chapter 3 4 you will find him referred to as the "true and faithful witne "

Is Woman Suffrage Coming in 1917?

Leaders of Both Sides Explain Their Plans and Their Faith to Christian Herald Readers

HIGH in the air, a scaffold. Thereon two women painting. The picture they have drawn on the side of a brick building has a familiar look. The first glance shows it to a ap of the United States. Yet, upon second anc it has an unfamiliar look. Nevada, Illinois and nsylvania, for instance, do not appear in their ay colors, yellow, green or pink. The western-most ction of this map is all white; the ild west and extreme east are gray; while a black border, as of mourning, ng the eastern coast and nearly all s th.

The women, Mrs. James Morrison and Mrs. arrison Monroe Brown of Chicago, were ar from satisfied with their work. The eture had too little white in it. However, Iowa would soon shine out as a big ght spot, they were sure. So sure were ey that plans were already made for t national woman suffrage chairman and Iowa state chairman to mount this scaffold when the proper time came and spectacular fashion put Iowa on the map startling white amid the cheers of oers.

The map had been painted for the eyes of t delegates to the Republican National Convention. The white states represent those enjoying the privileges of full suffrage; the gray or striped States, those where partial suffrage has been granted; while the black portion represented the sections where women have not yet won the ballot at all. About the same time the Convention met in Chicago, the question of suffrage was to be voted on in Iowa. Suffragists were positive of victory. Yet after l, the opposition won, and Iowa was not nted white. The two chairmen did not unt the scaffolding. There were no cheers from the onlookers.

HALL in a New York skyscraper, in the headquarters of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, from day to day meet committees of women, planning how to paint Iowa and her yet unenfranchised sister states white. Planning how raise and how to spend $1,000,000 for suffrage between October, 1916, and October, 1917. So sure are they of victory that the walls of their offices bear flaunting banners which proclaim: "Suffrage is Coming in 1917."

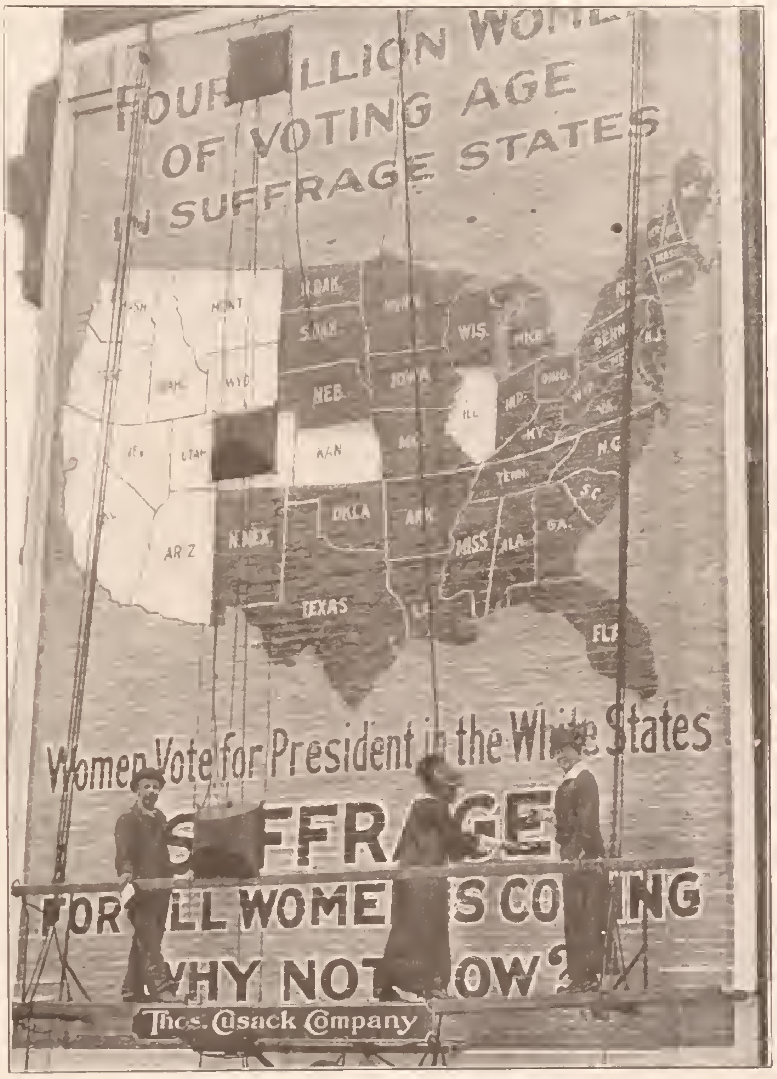
For the first time a platform of work for a nation-wide campaign has been adopted in order that all the states may work together on one general plan.

A picturesque feature is to be a monthly demonstration held in all parts of the country simultaneously. A series of tableaux symbolizing woman's demand for the vote will be given in every city and town where the women can be persuaded to cooperate.

The campaign is to be conducted along individual lines of effort. Individuals at work with individuals. The individual voter, the individual woman, the individual political leader, the individual legislator, the individual candidate (whether he stands any show of election or not). No man or woman not heretofore converted to "votes for women" will escape. No matter who you are, the suffragists will get you whether you watch out or not!

The platform of work includes a nationalized scheme for education through literature; innumerable activities for agitation and publicity; at least four campaign directors and two hundred organizers in the field and a vigorous thorough organization in every state a national committee on non-English propaganda whose duty it shall be to extend suffrage propaganda among the various non-English-speaking races. In its platform the association calls especial attention to the fact that during the entire forty-seven years of its existence its attitude toward the political parties has been strictly non-partisan; its victories have been due friends in all parties. The association is firmly of the opinion that adherence or hostility to any party is to be condemned, and declares its continued allegiance to the policy of non-partisanship.

The fact that every one of the five political parties has recognized the question of suffrage this year, and that every Presidential candidate has expressed himself in favor of it, seems to show that the demand for the vote by women has been acknowledged as an issue.



"Yet after all Iowa was not painted white"

This is the first time that either the Republican or Democratic party has put a suffrage plank in its platform. It is also the first time that the Anti-Saloon League has indorsed woman suffrage. Having apparently converted the political leaders, the suffragists are now to turn their special attention toward converting the individual opponent.

"Suffrage events this year," say the women, "indicate that the increase in correct thought concerning the Federal amendment is about to culminate in correct action. But such action will come only when the states also do active congressional work. In other words, a lobby in Washington for special educational purposes may be a good thing—there is always value in that kind of work—but the states will have to do special educational and political work if the committee is to have the political power in Washington to achieve political action there to the extent of a two-thirds favorable vote on the amendment. If the Federal amendment is to be put through this coming session, the suffragists in the various states must work just as hard in their states as they expect the Congressional Committee to work in Washington."

There is a perfectly good and logical reason for this double demand. Not only must "the folks back home" support the lobby in Washington, but they must also convert their state politicians. Supposing the Federal amendment should secure the required two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress. It must then be referred to the legislatures of the forty-eight states and receive the ratification of thirty-six. Supposing a congressman from any state, when urged by the lobby in Washington to vote for the amendment, should say, "Oh, I don't think the folks in my state really want the amendment passed." Speedily will go the word to "the folks back home," and before Mr. Congressman can say Jack Robinson twice, he will be deluged with telegrams and letters entreating him to vote for the measure. "Every congressman is a good enough politician," say the women, "to recognize the sentiment of home voters, whatever his personal opinion may be. It is this 'back fire' which we are now going to concentrate our attention upon. We are going to begin a course of 'intensive farming.'" Supposing Mr. Assemblyman when urged to give his vote for the women, replies in similar vein, "Oh, I don't think the people in my part of the state are in sympathy with passing the amendment." Speedily again will the word be sent to his particular "folks back home," and he in turn will be made miserable until he surrenders. And then, having got the bill through the legislatures, the men of the states must be won to cast their vote for it.

"The aim of the Woman Suffrage Party," says Mrs. James Lee Laidlaw, "is to focus all the existing suffrage work directly upon the political representatives of the people, to the end that they may be induced to work for the suffrage bill once it has been introduced into the legislature."

A most important event for New York women is the meeting of the forty-eighth annual New York State Suffrage Convention next month (November 20-24), when the campaign for the "big drive" of the next twelve months will be planned. The bill went through the New York legislature last year and must go again this year. It must be passed by two different Senates, and as this is senatorial year the women on the political committee are at work on all who are running. The women feel confident the bill will pass.

"We must convince them," says Mrs. Martha Wentworth Suffren of New York, "that civilization needs a woman's point of view. Its laws are now largely man-made; it needs both men and women."

"TELL the Christian Herald readers that we are simply answering what President Wilson has termed 'the call of duty,'" says Mrs. Laidlaw. "No academic desire for a vote could ever fire the women as they are fired. Nothing could do it but a burning realization of the need of the mother heart in redeeming the world. All the women prominently identified with woman suffrage are women who are identified with social service and philanthropy, women who have done big constructive work. We are tired of patching up pieces. We are done with alleviation. We want to deal with causes at first hand. We are not narrow in our aims. While talking woman suffrage we are disseminating ideas for the remedy of child labor, the social evil, and the liquor traffic, and for the advancement of all that is patriotic and democratic. More and more in our meetings is the evangelistic spirit evident. Woman suffragists are crusaders with an evangelistic passion for bettering the world."

"My message to the Christian Herald readers," says Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, "is this: The final victory for woman suffrage rests with the more conservative women of the churches. While the more progressive element have largely been won, there still remains a great number of sincere conservative church

The World's Emancipation Proclamation

*A SERMON BY REV. C. A. MUTCH, D.D.

TEXT—John 1 : 29. "Behold the Lamb of God."

THE position of John was extraordinary: he stood at the climax of revelation. He stood upon the very summit of human privilege when he cried: "Behold the Lamb of God." His mission was greater than any that had hitherto been allotted to men. It was his privilege to announce to multitudes who had come to hear him preach at the Jordan, that the new era, for which devout men and women had prayed in every period of Jewish history, and concerning which the prophets had prophesied, was now at hand. Like all truly great men he was no respecter of persons. "Repent ye" was his message to scribe and Pharisee, soldier and publican, prince or ecclesiastic. It was as easy for him to say to Herod, "It is not lawful," as it was to say to the soldier, "Be content with your wages." It is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for us to realize how this announcement must have startled those who heard it, and most of all the Pharisees. We are not far from the truth when we say that the opposition of the ruling classes had its beginnings on the banks of the Jordan, where Jesus was pointed out to the people and declared to be the Lamb of God.

Under the law various sacrifices were appointed; chief among these was the paschal lamb. It is clear that when John saw Jesus and declared him to be the Lamb of God, he had reference to his sacrificial character. Philip the Evangelist (Acts 8 : 32, 33) applied the words the eunuch read (from Isaiah 53 : 7, 8) to Christ and his sacrificial death. The apostle Peter in his first Epistle (I Peter 1 : 18, 19) declares the same truth. Thus Isaiah, six hundred years before the advent of our Lord, John the Baptist at the beginning of Jesus' ministry, and Peter long after the crucifixion of Christ, speak of him as the Lamb of God, whose accepted sacrifice brings peace and purity to all.

WHEN persons or things were set apart for sacred uses they were anointed with oil. Kings were anointed, which ceremony was a formal investment with full authority of the office. Priests also were anointed when they assumed the office and duties of the priesthood. So also the prophets. Anointing with holy oil was the symbol of consecration. It was also a typical representation of the communication of the Holy Spirit to Christ and to those who would believe on him. Jesus is called the "Messiah" or "Anointed One." He is Mediator, Prophet, Priest and King, and a spiritual anointing consecrating him to these offices was distinctly claimed by himself. When he was in the synagogue at Nazareth he read from Isaiah these prophetic words: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor," and after closing the book, he said: "This day hath this Scripture been fulfilled in your ears." At his baptism the Holy Spirit descended in the form of a dove and rested upon him, and a voice from heaven said: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

He was anointed with light. The whole world was lying in darkness; it had lost the knowledge of God and the way of salvation. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." The world was dead; he came to bring life. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly" (John 10 : 10). He revealed the Father's attitude toward the repentant sinner. In creating the world God's wisdom and power are displayed. In redeeming mankind his great heart is revealed. The only possible way for him to reveal his love perfectly was in the person of his Son. He clothed him with authority to preach the glad tidings to the poor; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord; to publish the emancipation proclamation of universal freedom from the bondage of sin; to declare the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. He was anointed with power to feed the hungry; to heal the sick and to cure the lepers; to give sight to the blind and to make the lame leap as an hart. He had power to forgive sin, to cast out demons, to raise the dead to life. He and he alone had the power to reconcile us to God. What an hour was that in the history of the world when Jesus was publicly consecrated to the great work of redemption! His birth was heralded by the angels with strains of music such as man had never yet heard; but when he was anointed by the Holy Spirit, the heavens bent low over the earth and the voice of the Father was heard, saying: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

THE lamb offered in sacrifice must be perfect, without spot or blemish. This was typical of the sinlessness, the absolute perfection of Christ (Heb. 9 : 13, 14; 1 Peter 1 : 19). The challenge of Christ, "Which of you convicteth me of sin?" has never been answered. It never will be answered. That challenge has come ringing down through the centuries, saying to each generation, "Which of you convicteth me of sin?" It will challenge each generation that shall yet come into the world. At his trial, Pilate said he found "no fault in him," and that verdict stands. Though he only intended to say that he was not guilty as charged in the indictment, yet it is in fact the unqualified statement of the absolute perfection of Jesus Christ.

THE SHADOWS

By A. W. Cooper

IN THE shadows
Deep and darkening,
God's eye watcheth
O'er his own;

Through the shadows,
To us hearkening,
God's voice speaketh
From his throne;

Speaketh, saying,
"I will never
Leave my loved ones
All alone."

Trust in him, when Storm-clouds lower,
When the noonday
Sun is bright;

Hear him saying,
"I am leading,
Ever leading To the light."

Pilate said much more than he knew. Neither Jew nor infidel accuses him of sin. Indeed, some of the most glowing tributes ever paid to Christ, to his work and life and character, have come from his foes. He has been called "the highest model of religion;" "the irreproachable;" "the guide of humanity;" "the regenerator of humanity;" "the healer of the blind and lame and demoniac." The history of Jesus has been called "the unsurpassed story." Each generation studies his life with increasing interest and with a keenly critical spirit, yet the profoundest scrutiny only adds to the sublimity of that perfect life. "Having been made perfect, he became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation."

THE word atonement is a broad term and includes two things, propitiation and expiation; the one looking Godward, the other looking manward. Christ's death upon the cross has this twofold relation. It is important to remember that the Levitical sacrifices were of an expiatory character. The terms taken from them are applied so frequently to the sufferings and death of Christ in the New Testament, that if we are sound in our faith we shall have no difficulty in "regarding the death of Christ as the grand, universal sin offering for the whole world." By his atonement he reaches down under the most degraded sinner, and if the sinner will have it so, exalts him to the royal relation of sonship. He pulls him out of the pit, out of the miry clay, and places his feet upon the Rock. He draws hi out the awful abyss of sin and puts him upon th mou taintop of duty and privilege. He transfo s h who lives on the husks and had become sw ish nature and practice, into a prince of the h ver realm. He removes his filthy garments and loth him in the robes of His own righteousn s. changes him from an outcast, who is witho ho and without God in the world, into an heir of d a a joint heir with Christ. The one-time sin r n walks in the imperial highway of God. Wit n h a light has been kindled, and he has become o of t many lights of the world whose friendly ra s h illumine the darkness, guiding others to God He given the spirit of adoption whereby he cries, Abb Father." A new song is upon his lips and sin "I have been redeemed." He is no more a ve evil passions; he is free! Every tissue of t bo and all the sensibilities of the soul vibrate w h li as the strings of the instrument vibrate at th tou of the musician. There is a sparkle in th ye, glow upon the countenance, a springiness in t ste which the redeemed alone manifest. In the asp the hand there is the feeling of real fellowsh H whole bearing tells us his lineage.

There is a vision, of the glory of which w mu catch a glimpse. This vision was vouchs ed John the Evangelist, who had been a disciple Jo the Baptist. He enjoys the unique distin on having heard the announcement, "Behold th Lan of God," whose sacrifice would open the new d pens tion of grace to a dying world; and for him o t veil that separates the present from the fut e w lifted. He saw salvation begun and in a vis n sa it completed. He gives us a glimpse of the ity God and attempts to describe it by using term whic in all periods of history, have expressed man's ighe conceptions of glory, honor, and majesty. n th lonely, desolate island of exile in the Ægean ea. had a vision of the Lamb and of those whom e ha redeemed, and of the heavenly city, such s wa never before nor since vouchsafed to mortals. n th distance he saw a great white throne. Its bea y wa dazzling and it was encircled by a rainbow lecte by the crystal sea. Around that throne w e th white-robed elders and the radiant hosts of ngel But what are all these celestial glories, h ven intelligences and heavenly hierarchies when co pare with the Lamb of God? What glory, what s ndo what majesty are his! Behold the Lamb, t Kin Immortal, crowned with light and life and l e an glory and power and majesty ineffable! W ca describe the Lamb of God, the Saviour of m ?

BUT the crowning time is not yet complet W love to think that, when the work of salv ion i fully accomplished, and God shall gather h love ones home, we too shall have a part in the co atio of the Lamb. As John's eyes swept over tha visio beatific, he sees another multitude different f n th rest, and one of the elders asks him: "What a thes which are arrayed in white robes? and when cam they?" Either John did not know or he wa afrai to answer, so he said, "Thou knowest." T n th elder said to him: "These are they which cam out o great tribulation, and have washed their ro s an made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Thi may have been that noble company of apost s an martyrs who in all ages have suffered for the Na e an sealed their faith by their blood. But we hav neve suffered so and we cannot belong to that co pany He looks again, and behold, a great multitude whic no man can number, who had come from all cli s an tongues and peoples, and stood before the am clothed in white robes and with palms in their ands Thank God, that is the company to which y Hi sovereign grace we may belong and with w n w may have part in the coronation, crying: "Sa atio to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, a unt the Lamb." When the redeemed of God sha hav been gathered from the east and from the we fron the north and from the south out of all natio s an kindreds and tongues and tribes and peoples whe the multitudes which no man can number sha com from Europe, from Asia, from Africa, from A erica from Australia, from the isles of the sea, and e se shall give up its dead and all the ransomed f th Lord shall come to the Father's house, then y w too be among those that shall cast our trop es a his feet and crown him Lord of all.

The Unspeakable Secret

SUNDAY, October 29. II Cor. 12 : 4. "Unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." Yes, but it is only as a man has something unspeakable within him that he is able to speak with irresistible power. The "unspeakable" influences everything he says, and gives to every word the mystic suggestion of the infinite and the eternal. The man who can say everything has never very much to say. It is the nameless something, always struggling for expression, and yet never expressed, which carries the awful energy of God. It is when we have some "secret of the Lord," deeply hidden in the soul, and refusing all the manifold vehicles of speech, that our speech becomes heavily weighted with the power of the Holy Ghost.

Take the unutterable secret of conversion. How much can we say about that hidden wonder? How far do the words of the apostle Paul lead us into his lonely experience? He often referred to it, but how little he unveiled! And yet that unspeakable secret speaks in everything he ever said. It makes the atmosphere of all his speech: it determines its color, and it gives color and warmth to all his words. Nothing can carry the secret, but everything bears its [illegible] And so it was when the apostle, in one ecstatic experience, was "caught up into Paradise." All words became like broken vessels, yet the light of the glory of that experience burns in every letter he wrote in after days.

What language can tell the secret wonders in the heart of a young girl when love is just shyly awaking in the seclusion of her soul? Words are almost idle ministries in the rising glory, and yet the unspeakable secret glows and burns in everything. And so it is with a saint's love for the Lord, and with a saint's discoveries of the love of the Lord. The things are unspeakable, and yet they are always speaking, expressing themselves in graces and adorning every issue in life with strength and loveliness. These secrets cannot be manifested, neither can they be hid. They are unutterable, and yet there is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard.

And so we must seek for the unspeakable if we would be powerful witnesses for the King. We must "take root downward, if we would bear fruit upward." We must be reverently led into the secret place of the Most High, where the secret of the Lord is made known to them that fear him. And with these tremendous experiences in our souls, things that cannot be spoken, we shall yet be manifesting their presence all the day long. J. H. J.

"Heavenly Visions"

MONDAY, October 30. Acts 26 : 19. "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision." Thrice unhappy are they who have never had a heavenly vision, i. e., a vision of something higher and better than the life they have been leading. It may have come in a sermon, a biography, a holy life, a face, a described scene illuminated with the light of another world. How it shamed, rebuked, cast down with infinite regret, then raised to a new hope and determination!

Thank God for these heavenly visions that chasten, purify, energize us! But remember that they are fugitive. Shakespeare speaks of "the shapeless fabric" of vision. Everything depends on how we treat them. Every photographer knows that the picture which has been caught on the sensitive plate will soon disappear, unless in a dark chamber it is passed through the solutions that make it permanent; and what is true of the fading impression of the face or landscape is still more so of the heavenly visions that break in on the dull monotony or sinful madness of our lives. We can keep them only in so far as we obey them. If we delay, or refuse for but an hour, they die away, never to return.

Act, act, in the living present. Do not disobey! And remember that procrastination is the practical equivalent to disobedience. It may be at a great cost to you, as it was to the apostle, to uproot yourself from old associations and habits; but in the retrospect of your life you will confess that you were amply repaid. F. B. M.

Cheerfulness

TUESDAY, October 31. Matt. 9 : 2. "Son, be of good cheer: thy sins are forgiven." It has always seemed strange to me that so much lugubriousness has crept into religion, when the central message of Jesus was glad tidings, love, and peace and goodwill to men. The entire Gospel seems to be in line with Solomon's word: "He that is of a cheerful heart hath a continual feast." Certainly, in the ministry of the Master a train of light was always left behind him; and this light was never more apparent than among the people, like this palsied sick man who was bidden to be cheerful because his sins were forgiven. Should the Christian with a similar experience in these days of advanced privileges be less gladsome?,

It is a fact, however, that even to speak of religion and Christian experience in certain gatherings will cause persons to lower their voices and look dismal and solemn. The subject is taken up with bated breath, as though one were talking about sorrow and death and "the worm that dieth not." I rather agree with Robert Louis Stevenson, who said that he liked the literature of the Bible because it "is a cheerful book; it is our little piping theologies, tracts, and sermons," he adds, "that are dull and dowie."

The Bible is always reminding people that they have wings, if they would only use them; it is talking to us continually of the privileges of praising the Lord, of forgiven sin, and of "songs in the night." A man on shipboard in the Indian seas told me that he had been lifted out of despair black as night by finding in the Bible the hopeful verse, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow."

Jesus is the "Man of Sorrows" only to those people who forget that he was continually giving evidence of a deep joyousness which the world could neither give nor take away. Get in the habit of looking in your Bible for its good cheer, for its promises of happiness, and remember that if God has really forgiven your sins, he has asked you to be cheerful. C. S. C.

Deliverance from Ourselves

WEDNESDAY, November 1. Acts 5 : 31. "Him did God exalt with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour." The order here is of absolute importance. We shall never experience salvation in its deepest sense, unless we put Jesus Christ's Kingship first. Many people seem to suppose that in salvation our escape from future punishment is the only consideration. But that is a very small thing, and entirely depends, through the work of the Divine Spirit, on whether we have been delivered from the love and power of sin. Salvation may be conjugated in the past, present, or future tense. It is quite true that as soon as a sinner trusts in Jesus Christ, he is instantly and forever saved. "He shall not come into condemnation but is passed out of death into life."

But it is also true that when we really and truly trust in Jesus the work of sanctification begins within us; we daily leave what is behind and reach toward what is before; we become humbler, gentler, purer; the old things pass away and all things become new. This is the real meaning of salvation—we are delivered from ourselves, our old habits, our prejudices and passions; and for this the Kingship of Christ is absolutely necessary. Until we give him the key of every chamber in the heart-house, he cannot get at the evil places, where the traitors lurk. The physician must know all our symptoms, and his dealing with our body must be absolute, or he cannot cure. Jesus must be King of Salem before he can be Priest of the Most High. Your King must come to you as he entered the gates of Jerusalem before on his Cross he can work out and bring in everlasting righteousness. Then we may await in perfect confidence the future phase of salvation, when he shall appear the second time.

Bible Sermons

THURSDAY, November 2. Luke 24 : 32. "Was not our heart burning within us, while he spake to us in the way?" After Jesus had vanished from the sight of the disciples, it was thus that they assured themselves of his reality. Their hearts were stirred by the way he opened to them the Scriptures.

My picture of Mr. Moody remains as he used to stand before the students at Northfield, with his open Bible in his hands, telling in a wonderfully simple and sincere way the meaning of the familiar passages from the Bible—passages I had read many times, but which had never been made tangible and real to my personal experience. Mr. Moody's sermons were principally expositions of Bible narratives, which he interpreted with that mingled pathos and humor that brought the principles home so vividly.

Here is the great opportunity for the Bible teacher, for the pastor. Let us have the "social" message, but let us have it in the spirit and fervor of the Bible. Unless it thrills with the breath of God, unless it makes men's hearts burn within them as did the message of Jesus, it will be empty sociology—interesting, but not a moving, vital force that captures the loyalty of the soul. The big simple truths that the Bible presents on almost every page are the fascinating, compelling truths. When I take these Bible subjects for my Bible classes, I see a difference at once in the attention of the men. As one said to me recently, "These subjects about home, and love, and sin, and eternal life with God, hit us all."

Remember, the world never tires of Bible sermons.

The Tenderness of a Great Heart

FRIDAY, November 3. Acts 20 : 32. "I commend you to God and to the word of his grace." We associate intellectual strength and untiring energy with the great apostle, and are apt to forget his tender love and yearning for the welfare of his converts. His was one of the tenderest hearts that ever beat—a heart with intense affections, lively emotions, and quick tears. He had willingly given up the right to marry because he desired the utmost liberty for the proclamation of his message; but the very loneliness of his life made him more open to the sacred ties that, as this chapter indicates, bound him to his disciples.

Think of the large number of brethren and sisters enumerated by name at the end of most of his epistles, and greeted with special messages, which are precisely adapted to character and need. His love was warmly and nobly reciprocated by a Priscilla and an Aquila, who had risked their lives for him; by an Andronicus and a Junias, who had shared his prison; by a Persis and a Rufus! And what better could they do, at that supreme hour, than part in God? He handed back the charge of the flock to the Great Shepherd. He knew how much grace would be needed, but never doubted that it would be forthcoming. And there he left it!

The Silent Forces of God

SATURDAY, November 4. Ps. 46 : 10. "Be still, and know that I am God." Stillness does not mean inactivity. One may be the most quiet when the busiest, and have the deepest feelings in moments of calmness. The serene composure of the Christian mind under all circumstances is owing to the consciousness of the indwelling Spirit of God. We know that in every sea of trouble Christ calms the waves, and in every loss makes all things work together for good. In hours of great exigencies we may exclaim as did General Garfield when he said, "God reigns and the government at Washington still lives."

Nature is wonderfully expressive in her silences. Her scenes of sublimity and grandeur are voiceless, but powerful to thrill the soul. The stars in their splendor silently speak of the heavens above them. The planets, moving with noiseless footsteps, break forth in the music of the spheres. "Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." Every moment we stand in the presence of mute forces that speak to us of the almighty Creator in silent symphonies. Sunbeams quietly fill the bosom of the earth with new life, and robe her form in beautiful garments. So the Sun of Righteousness makes our storm a calm, and turns wintry night into glorious day. Then he leadeth us beside the still waters where we rest in the Lord and hear him say, "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength." E. W. C.

SIR CHARLES WAKEFIELD, Lord Mayor of London, at a recent annual meeting of the Bible League made this powerful plea for a revival of Bible study: "There probably never was a time in the history of the world when reverence for and study of the Holy Word were more called for than at this supreme moment in the destiny of the nation. I think we have been too prone in the past to allow modern criticism to whittle away our belief in and therefore our reverence for the great leading tenets of the Christian faith, with the result that we have become lax and indifferent, and we now tolerate and condone specious doubts and the putting forward of plausible difficulties with regard to the Scriptures which in our childhood would have been treated as mortal sin. Let us hope that, when the war is over, we may return to a greater reverence for the Word of God than has of late been prevalent, and that, in a humbler and more chastened and contrite spirit, the revival of studious interest in the Holy Scriptures may tend to soften all the asperities which the war has raised."

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

Supreme Court in Session. The United States Supreme Court held its first sitting of the new session on October 9. The new associate justice, John H. Clarke of Cleveland, took the oath of office and sat with the court, making a full bench for the first time in nearly a year. The calendar of the court holds more than 700 cases, the most important being the government anti-trust suits against the harvester, steel, coal, moving picture, kodak, bill-posters, shoe machinery and Great Lakes tow-boat "trusts." The court will also be asked to pass upon the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon Liquor Law, the Migratory Bird Act, the provision of the Underwood Tariff Act rebating five per cent. of the duty on merchandise imported on American vessels, an Oregon law providing a minimum wage for women and a ten-hour day for men, a Louisville, Ky., ordinance segregating blacks and whites, and the Mann "White Slave" Act. The court will also be asked to pass on the legality of the United Mine Workers' Organization, Blue Sky laws of Ohio, Michigan and South Dakota, North Carolina liquor laws, the domestic corporation tax of Alabama, Federal water power rights on public lands, and railroad land grants in Oregon and California.

A Giant Canal. A canal 250 miles long, to cost $150,000,000, is being planned by American engineers to connect the Arctic Ocean with the Baltic Sea, from Kandalaska on the White Sea to Tornea near the Swedish frontier on the Gulf of Finland. The proposition is said to have strong support in Russia.

Wanamaker Imports a "Farm." Customs officials at New York were reported on October 8 as undecided whether to assess "Goatley Farm" as an antique or as a manufacture in part of wood. In the first case the duty would be nil, in the second case fifteen per cent. "Goatley Farm" was a Kentish country home, erected about 1470. It was purchased by John Wanamaker and imported to America in a consignment of 400 big packing cases. Everything from the tiles of the roof to the stones of the cellar walls was shipped to America, each piece being properly labeled so that "Goatley Farm" might be reestablished, intact and with all its ancient atmosphere, upon the broad acres of some American estate. Frescoes, wainscoting, decorations and parts of houses have been imported before, but never before this a complete building.

"Tom Brown" Resigns. Thomas Mott Osborne, who in two years has remade Sing Sing Prison, resigned on October 9 because he felt that orders from the State Prison Department hopelessly restricted his work and were an evidence of lack of the sympathetic cooperation which had been promised him when he accepted the wardenship.

Royalty Among the Refuse. The excavators of the Egyptian Expedition sent out by Harvard University and the Boston Museum, which has been making excavations at Gebel Barkel on the site of a great temple of old Ethiopia, found under the floor of a temple built about 100 B. C. two refuse heaps into which had been dumped unusable material of older temples which the new temple replaced. Among the refuse were found fragments from which were restored the statues of ten kings of Ethiopia who reigned in the period between 1600 and 100 B. C. The names of four kings were found, Tirhaka, who is mentioned in the Old Testament as having given battle to Assyria in the eighth century before Christ, Amon-anal, his son Espalta, this statue being complete, and a late king named Senka-Amon-Seken.

Should the United States Offer Mediation Now?

From the New York American, October 9.

Whether or not Ambassador Gerard is bringing with him a request from Germany for the good offices of the United States we cannot say. But it needs no formal request from the Central Empires to inform Americans that Germany is ready to negotiate terms of peace with the Allies.

All the world has known for a year now that such was the German government's attitude, publicly stated by the German chancellor.

The coordination between Germany, Austria, Turkey and Bulgaria is so complete that Germany can, and does, speak for all.

There can be no peace except in one of two ways:

(1) Either by the complete destruction of one or the other combatant's power of defense and the absolute dictation of terms to the conquered by the conquerors; or

(2) By the acceptance of neutral mediation, leading to a parley and final negotiations in a peace congress.

We believe that the first method is impossible, because neither group of combatants can completely crush the defensive power of the other.

A calm and impartial survey of the situation in Europe, after more than two years of colossal expenditures of money and blood such as the world never would have deemed possible, shows no great preponderance in relative offensive power and no great diminution of relative defensive power on either side.

The powerful German offensive against Verdun was stopped weeks ago after huge losses on both sides; but Germany still holds the conquered terrain.

The powerful Franco-British offensive on the Somme has been practically stopped after the loss of 500,000 French and British soldiers and two-thirds as many Germans, but Germany still holds the conquered terrain.

The net result of both colossal struggles was simply to prove that neither could break through the defense of the other.

On the Italian front the Austrians broke into Italy—and were stopped. Then the Italians broke into Austria—and were stopped.

In the East the struggles in the Caucasus and in Greece are both clearly at stalemate. Either side which tries an offensive is checked with severe losses.

In Russia the Czar's troops and the Kaiser's troops have faced each other since a year ago last May, with practically no change in their lines.

In Galicia Brusiloff's offensive, at first extremely rapid, has been completely checked. The Russian and Austrian losses have been frightful and the result is the same regular stalemate.

In Rumania alone has success of a decisive nature attended a campaign, and while the Rumanians are probably due to be exterminated as a military factor, yet the loss is not an actual diminution of the Allies' comparative strength, since Rumania was a recently added and not an original factor.

In spite of the frightful butchery, the man-power of neither side is anywhere near exhaustion. While France, with its smaller population and stationary birth-rate and its disproportionate share of the two years' fighting, has suffered dreadfully, there are still millions of Russian and British availables to draw upon; and the absolute losses of the Central Powers in the two years are almost exactly balanced by the number of youths who have reached the age of service in Germany and Austria during the same period.

Ninety days ago The American's own competent and trustworthy correspondents and observers found that the trained and ready reserves in the Central Empires who had not yet been employed on any front exceeded twice the number of absolute Teutonic losses in the past two years. So far as "attrition" of man-power goes, either side could fight for ten years yet.

The question of money cost is the really pressing one, and will end the war perforce—if reason does not invite earlier peace—long before either food shortage or man shortage is decisively felt.

But even in finances there is no great disparity of defensive power evident, since the Allies' superior wealth is balanced by the hugely superior cost of their operations.

We have thus summed up the real war situation at this considerable length because upon the recognition of the true situation rests the hope of early peace.

Germany being frankly willing to enter into peace negotiations, the question of prolonging the war depends solely upon the Allies; and by their decision the neutral world can judge whether or not they are bent upon an honorable peace or whether their purpose is to destroy the Central Empires completely—with the certain result of making Russia the final master of all Europe.

We cannot believe that the acute and thoroughly informed statesmen of England and France have any intention of bankrupting and ruining their own countries in a war of extermination upon the Central Empires that would leave England and France, as well as Germany, Austria, Turkey and the Balkans, at the mercy of Petrograd.

And for all these reasons we believe that the true feeling of the wisest English statesmanship is not represented by the truculent and somewhat flamboyant "war-to-the-knockout" pronouncement of Lloyd-George, but by the calm and reasonable statements of Lord Bryce and other leaders of British thought.

In his address delivered at Birmingham, on October 2, Lord Bryce plainly stated that he and Premier Asquith and Earl Grey and Mr. Balfour were heartily in accord in favoring a league to establish and to enforce the maintenance of peace, and by unmistakable implication let it be understood that the friendship and cooperation of the United States were absolutely essential to the restoration and the maintenance of peace.

If there is anything sure, then it is sure that the peoples of Europe are each as heartily sick of this horrid slaughter as each is heartily determined not to be conquered and destroyed.

The heart of Germany, the heart of Austria, the heart of Russia, the heart of France, the heart of Italy—if the heart of a nation be the heart of its common people—is set, not upon conquest but wholly and sincerely upon defense of the fatherland.

And if the common people of all these countries could be promised that peace would mean no demand by either group of rulers for any part of the territories or any destruction of the national life of a single nation, the clamor for peace would rise above the tumult and uproar of war from Paris to Petrograd, from Berlin to Constantinople, from Vienna to Rome.

Now, then, countrymen and friends, this situation confronts us with the noblest opportunity and the most solemn obligation that ever befell a nation in all the tides of time.

That opportunity and that obligation is to offer our unselfish mediation to the Powers at war.

Consider our situation and with what clean hands and unquestionable motives we can thus appear in the arena of war bearing the message of mercy and goodwill.

With each day of war we, in our isolation and on our promontory of peaceful advantage, become richer and richer and relatively more powerful in all the resources of industry and all the potential implements of possible war. While Europe's wealth is wasted, ours increases. While Europe's men are slaughtered, our population grows. From every possible standpoint of selfish interest, the prolongation of the war brings to us without an effort a hundred times any spoil that victors could possibly take from the vanquished.

Therefore, the unselfishness of any efforts that we put forth to make short for Europe's bleeding feet the pathway to peace is evident to the sight of all the world.

And in that consists our noble opportunity, which is to show the world that the richest and most powerful nation in the world—for that we indubitably are—can and most willingly does put behind it the temptation to grow richer and more powerful still at the expense of others' dreadful loss and suffering, and prefers above its own individual selfish interests the interests of mankind and the good of the race and the advancement of the civilization of which we are a noble part and in which we are a powerful and wonderful factor.

Should the United States Offer Mediation Now?

Now, both our justice and our uprightness and our huge strength lay upon us the burden of voicing to the belligerent Powers the sentiments and the concern of the neutral world—make us, in fact, the interpreter and the spokesman of threatened and imploring civilization.

Almost we might say, with reverence, that God himself commands us to be his mouthpiece to the nations rushing to destruction in this dreadful Armageddon, and crushing beneath tempests of fire and steel the results of centuries of toil, the monuments of art and skill, and the strength and civilization of the great race to which we belong.

Countrymen, what is it to us that either this or that potentate or Power may express resentment if we speak out in the cause of humanity?

Are we, then, a Belgium or a Greece, to wear a muzzle and to go softly and to keep silence because of a hand on our throat and a sword held above our head in a menacing hand?

Where is the prince or chancellor that shall lay down a rule for this gigantic nation of ours and say to us, in our might and strength, "Thus ye shall speak, and thus ye shall keep silent?"

Countrymen, we should rouse ourselves to respond to the voice of humanity; we should quit ourselves like men, meditating wrong to none, fearing none, taking counsel only of our good intentions and conscious of our right and our power to intervene in this awful warfare with the message of mediation.

We owe to our own interests, to our own conscience, to our own great place in the world, to the neutral nations who look to us, to the distressed peoples of Europe, to religion, to civilization and to mankind and to God the performance of this high and sacred duty which the dreadful tide of overwhelming war has brought to our shores.

Citizens, this America of ours has, too, her place in the sun. There she should stand, like some bright, strong Angel of the Revelation, proclaiming justice and righteousness to the nations and sounding forth, as with the voice of a trumpet, the loud, clear message of peace on earth, good will to men.

Citizens, let us determine that our country shall play that splendid part; that from her own high place in the sun she shall proclaim the end of this tragedy of destruction and death, of this day of woe and wrath, this dread Apocalypse.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Greek situation became acute in the middle of the week under consideration, October 6–13. On M day, the 9th of October, the French ad iral commanding the fleet of the Al s off the Greek coast presented an ul atum: that the Greek government su ender to the Allies, on or before on o'clock Wednesday, the Greek fleet, wi three exceptions; the forts defending certain Greek ports; the Greek po office, telegraphs and telephones; an the Greek railroads, particularly th running from Piræus, the port of A ns, to Larissa in northern Greece, th main artery of the Greek railroad sy em.

he Greek government, having no ad quate means of defense against so la e a naval force as the Allies now have as mbled on the Greek coasts, agreed to ch surrender under protest, and it w duly carried out. The Greek navy w duly handed over on Wednesday, ex pting three vessels. The seizure of e posts, telegraphs and telephones m es it impossible for the Greek g ernment at Athens to communicate w other portions of the country.

uring the week Venizelos, the head of he revolution, arrived at Salonica wi the other members of the revolu- ti ary committee and started to or nize a government. Venizelos has a arently the support of the Greek is nds and, to a degree, of the territory a ed to Greece as a result of the B kan wars; but does not seem as yet to be receiving any support from Greece proper.

On the northern frontier, the Macedonian front, there has been considerable hard fighting. On the Allies' left wing, south of Monastir, the French, Serbians and Russians have been making valiant efforts to advance to Monastir all the week, and in the early part of the week made some decided progress when the Serbians forced their way across the Cerna river, near Brod, and captured that town, while the French and Russians broke through the Bulgarian first line of defense and established themselves between Kenali and Lake Presba. Later on, however, Bulgarian counter-attacks forced the Serbians to retreat and Brod was retaken. As this record closes a renewed Serbian effort to advance in this sector is being made.

In the center, the Vardar valley, there was some hard skirmishing, but no fighting of really serious importance. On the right wing, the Struma front, the British made a slight advance and occupied the village of Presink. Further to the east their cavalry reconnoitered the town of Seres, the northern end of the Bulgarian outflanking positions extending from that place to Kavalla, but found it too strongly held by the enemy to permit their attempting to attack.

The French auxiliary cruiser Gallia, 15,100 tons, carrying troops, was torpedoed in the Mediterranean, south of Salonica. Of the 2,000 men she carried, about 600 were lost.

Very little news indeed has come to us the past week concerning the Caucasian campaign, nor events in Persia; presumably, therefore, the situation is much the same as before in those spheres of action. An equal silence concerning the other minor campaigns is to be noted.

The British Parliament began its autumnal session on Monday, the 9th. The government asked for a fresh vote of credit from Parliament of $1,500,000,000, bringing the amount voted for the current financial year up to the enormous figure of $6,750,000,000. Quite an interesting debate also took place on the subject of British man power, in which Lloyd-George made the significant statement that while there was no doubt whatever about the country's available man power and reserves, it was necessary to get at them. "The exemptions had been far too numerous; if he gave the figures he would startle the House, as the exemptions had run into millions."

If the exemptions have run into millions, Great Britain's total available man power, including Ireland, being 8,400,000, it is difficult to see how 5,100,000 men were raised by volunteering, as has been repeatedly stated, when at least 2,800,000 men must be reserved for the navy, the commercial marine, the railroads, the munition factories and agriculture.

Les Arts, of Paris, the well-known French art magazine, has resumed publication, and its first two numbers contain a couple of articles from the pen of Paul Leon, chief of the architectural section of the Ministry of Fine Arts, on the French art losses in northern France at the hands of the Germans, which is well worthy of attention as the first authentic statement on this subject from a French source. It says:

"Let us be fair and just by admitting that for the present at least the most famous French art monuments in the hands of the enemy are safe. When von Kluck and his colleagues were thrown back from the Marne to the Aisne in September, 1914, scores of towns and villages were utterly destroyed, but happily no art monuments fell victims. The cathedral of Noyon, the church of Mouzon, the chapels of Avioth, have not been touched, and sacred concerts are being given in the cathedral of Laon. The cathedral of Amiens is intact. With the exception of very slight damages to Notre Dame, the Parisian art monuments have not, so far, been touched at all." Of Rheims cathedral he says, "Although it is irretrievably ruined in its decoration, this cathedral fortunately suffered no structural impairment." The whole article proves that the early reports of the art destruction were much exaggerated.

Events on the Picardy front of the western battle line were not as important or as interesting this week as last. On Saturday, October 7, it was very quiet indeed. The following day, in spite of bad weather, the British made a slight gain east and west of La Courcelette, though losing a few trenches to the Germans at Les Bœufs, to the east. On Monday, this front became more animated, particularly between Gueudecourt and Bouchavesnes, where a joint French and British attack was launched on the German positions, but unsuccessfully. The French artillery south of the Somme, however, displayed great activity, and on Tuesday this activity was followed by the French opening an infantry attack on the German positions opposite them on the line from Berny to Chaulnes. The Germans were driven completely from the village of Bovent, while the French advance did not halt until it had established itself, apparently firmly, in the northern and western outskirts of the village of Ablaincourt, about two miles from and a little to the southwest of Verandovillers.

In this advance the greater part of the wood of Chaulnes, near the village of the same name, also fell into French hands. About 1,200 German prisoners were taken by the French, whose object was, it would seem, to straighten and shorten the French line between Berny and Chaulnes, between which towns their old line curved well to the west, and then back again.

Wednesday was, on the whole, quiet, and Thursday, north of the Somme and west of the hamlet of Sailly-Sallise, there was warm fighting between the French and the Germans, and the French made some progress. Sailly-Sallise lies on the road running between Bapaume and Peronne, known as the Bethune road, about half-way between the two places and a little over a mile to the east of Morval, which the French captured last week.

The eastern front has been quieter all this week than for months. Late last week the Russians made a half-hearted attack southeast of Lemberg on the Austrian positions along the Zlota Lipa, but were rather easily repulsed. About the middle of the week there was a little hard fighting in the Brzezany region in Galicia, and west of Lutsk in Volhynia, another Russian attempt to hew a way through the Teutonic lines, which ended in a repulse. Thereafter the Teutons made slight gains northwest of Lutsk near Kolostrow and captured the village of Herbutow by storm, east of the Naraywoka River in Galicia; while all the week desultory fighting went on in southern Bukowina.

In the earlier portion of the period under consideration, the Austro-Italian front was far from animated, merely the usual artillery duels and unimportant skirmishes disturbing the usual quiet. On Tuesday, October 10, however, the Italian artillery on the Carso plateau front to the southeast of Gorizia suddenly sprang into intense activity, and this was followed the next day by a general attack by the Italians on the Austrian positions along the whole line of this front. This attack was in the main successful, and several lines of Austrian trenches passed into Italian hands. The next day the fighting continued and also the day after, and as a result, besides the territory conquered the Italians captured some 7,000 prisoners and a considerable quantity of artillery and munitions of war.

Turning now to the Rumanian fronts. In the Dobrudja, the week has been uneventful. Both sides seem content to hold their present positions. On the northern front, the Rumanian invasion of Transylvania has completely collapsed and, according to their own statements, their armies are in full retreat on the whole front and have completely abandoned Transylvanian territory after suffering heavy losses in men, and particularly in artillery. South of Kronstadt and south of Hermannstadt, the Teutonic forces are now operating on Rumanian ground.

It seems a conservative estimate to say that this abortive Transylvanian campaign has cost the Rumanians 75,000 men, or about 12½ per cent. of the very highest possible force Rumania could put in the field. If we add the losses Rumania has suffered on the southern front in the taking of Silistria and Tutrakan, her defeats in the Dobrudja and the crossing of the Danube near Rustchuk last week, it seems quite probable that 20 per cent. of her highest possible force has disappeared.

IN an interview with the king of Rumania reported by the London Times, Ferdinand is said to have declared that "the Rumanians will not falter, yet the Rumanians pray that in spite of their existing exigencies and their own huge problems, the Allies will not allow the affairs of Rumania, who has staked her all in this conflict, to pass into the back of their minds and to suffer her to meet the fate of either Belgium or Serbia." The king is said to have declared that at the beginning of the war there was in Rumania no hostility toward Germany, but rather friendship because Germany was an asset to the development of Rumania's industry and a potent instrument in forwarding the prosperity of Rumania. He said, however, that Rumania had not been moved to enter the war by mere expediency. In the British House of Commons on October 13 John Dillon complained that Premier Asquith in his speech on the previous day had given no assurance that the utmost resources would be employed to help Rumania in the hour of her trial to save her from the fate of Belgium and Serbia. "If we allow Rumania to be overrun," said Mr. Dillon, "maybe we shall never beat Germany." He expressed the belief that the war would be decided in the Balkans, and asked for a plain assurance from the War Secretary that the Allies would strain every nerve to assist Rumania.

"Come" and "Go"

"COME ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men," was the promise Jesus made to his disciples. How that pledge was fulfilled the whole world knows. Having accepted him as Messiah and Master, they set about their Lord's business to such purpose that today the little band of believers has multiplied to hundreds of millions of souls. There is no land where his name and his Gospel are unknown.

"Come" and "Go" are still the two commands to the convert. They are unchanged since apostolic days. After the soul has come to him and become united with him, the next message is to go to others. It is to proclaim the good news of a free salvation, a regenerated life, and an assurance of immortality to all who repent and believe.

Thus soul-winning is the chief business in life of every real Christian. Some work abroad, others in the homeland; some, through training and special adaptability, become leaders in the great crusade for souls; while others, restrained by limitations from which they cannot escape, find their field within a small radius. But even the smallest spiritual garden, tended with love and care, abundantly repays the labor spent upon it.

We have many times written of the joy of soul-winning, and we find much satisfaction in knowing that there are many soul-winners among our readers. But why should not all have this special joy? If Christ has come unto our own hearts, it should be our dearest wish to bring him unto others. Every one who has accepted the invitation to "Come," and who has put on the armor of faith, should strive for the joy of bringing a soul to Christ. It may be that this work awaits us in our homes, or among our familiar acquaintances. There is no post which the humblest Christian can occupy that does not afford some opportunity to do such service. Bella Cooke, shut-in and bedridden for many years, made her sickroom a Mecca for inquiring Christians, and from that little chamber in a rear tenement on Second Avenue, New York, there went out an influence that brought many souls into the Kingdom.

When life's journey is wellnigh done and we look back over the long road, it will be well if we can see those bright and shining landmarks that indicate some spiritual struggle in which, with God's help, we have overcome. And best of all to cheer us then will be the memory of our struggle for others, for "he that winneth souls is wise," and "they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

Two Years of Peace Effort

RECENT developments in the great world-war have gone forward at a tremendous pace—tremendous, however, chiefly in one respect: in the awful waste of human life. Victory has alternately been with the Allies and the Central Powers; but with all the slaughter and the sacrifice, the decisive battle seems still as far off as it was a year ago. With unequaled courage, splendid heroism and a scorn of danger and death such as has never been witnessed till now, the war has been waged until the powers of heaven and earth might well stand amazed at the spectacle. Millions of strong, brave men have been poured into the hopper of destruction, and millions more are ready to follow them blindly and devotedly to death.

This waste of the flower of the world's manhood has reached a point where nature itself is voicing a protest, and the people of all lands are demanding that the war should cease. Here and there a few strong utterances are heard in favor of continuing the struggle indefinitely; but these extremists stand alone. The people, who always bear the burden of the sacrifice, have come to the conclusion that Europe's statesmanship is incapable of giving a single valid reason why this futile war should go on in its work of national destruction.

In a compilation just issued by the American Association for International Conciliation, there is presented a general review of all efforts that have been made for peace since the beginning of the great war. Of the thirty-eight peace organizations from which proposals have emanated, seven are international, ten are American, eight are British, nine are German, two are Swiss, and France and Holland each have one. In every instance these organizations have been the spontaneous outgrowth of the national or international conscience. They have made themselves heard in the face of powerful official opposition. In their work in behalf of peace, the ablest minds of the world today are giving ardent support.

That commercial imperialism was one of the principal causes of the war is made convincingly clear in this instructive volume. It is shown that during the last half century the struggle for economic supremacy has been growing more and more intense. Exploitation of the weak by the strong has been everywhere the rule. It was a great territorial grab game, supported by the financial syndicates of Europe, and which resulted in the wholesale exploitation of a large part of Asia and Africa under the guise of spheres of influence and concessions. The game worked smoothly enough until the interests of the exploiters clashed—and then came war. England's jealousy of Germany's economic and colonial expansion, Russia's desire for an outlet to the Mediterranean, Germany's plans for a clear trade route to the East, France's far-reaching colonial ambitions, Austria's dream of a highway to the Ægean, Italy's hopes of regaining her lost provinces—all these were factors that helped to prepare the conflagration. The pile was ready and it needed only the application of the match.

Walter Lippmann, an American writer, has likened the present war to a contest to decide which power should become supreme in the concert of Europe. But the concert is discordant, utterly smashed by the cataclysm. Diplomacy has failed at every step, and the question of national prestige is now merged in the greater one of national existence. Begun in selfishness, the war has brushed aside all the old standards of comparison. At its close, as the outlook of these thirty odd peace organizations shows, we may look for a new Europe, raised from the ashes of the old—a chastened Europe, which will value peace above all material possessions. The Europe of tomorrow will have vision and inspiration. No more will it be a group of powers that plunder and destroy and make laws founded upon selfishness; that oppress the toiling masses and make the skill of man tributary to a vast system of murderous armaments, as in the past. These organizations look confidently for a broader patriotism, a purer civilization, and the long-hoped-for world-wide federation of peace, to protect the weak and keep the strong in check, and to put an end forever to the sin of competitive militarism.

Such are the conclusions reached by the leading students and promoters of this wonderful peace movement, which has been gaining all through the war. And who shall say that in those vigorous minds, unshaken by the tumult raging around them, there is not something of the inspiration of the old-time prophets whose vision reached far into the future? If the great hope which they set forth should be realized—as we believe it will be—it will mean something worth living for, working for, praying for. Kings and cabinets may hold the peace advocates in slight regard; but the Power that overrules evil for good will be their trust and mainstay. They are working in harmony with Omnipotence, and their mission to awaken the conscience of the world will surely succeed in the end. The time is coming when diplomacy will drop its aggressive tone and strike a different keynote. America must be prepared to help restore world-peace when the opportunity arrives.

Only Sixteen Days More!

IN sixteen days, a little over two weeks, the price of the Christian Herald will be raised. We would caution our readers to keep the date, November 10, in mind, for, as we have so many times explained, we shall be compelled then to charge $2 for a year's subscription.

To those who cannot afford to pay the increased price we would say, renew your subscription before November 10, even if your present subscription has not expired. We will accept a yearly subscription at $1.50 until November 10 and we will cause the new subscription to operate as soon as your present subscription has expired, provided always, of course, that this does not carry the subscription over into 1918, as we are accepting subscriptions only until December 31, 1917. This is a chance which every one can afford.

When we first made the announcement we suffered a little trepidation, because in these days so many people do not care willingly to increase the expense of living even for such a necessity as a religious paper. But we have received so many letters from friends who desire to cooperate with us in helping to pay the increased cost of publishing the Christian Herald that we feel sure next year will see no diminution in the ranks of the Christian Herald Family. Here is a letter from a friend in Michigan, who says:

> In an article of the 27th inst., page 1079, it says that some regret that the price of the Christian Herald will be raised to $2. With them I do not agree. The paper is worth that. I hope it will continue to be a blessing in the future as it has en in the past.

Another subscriber, writing from Kentucky says in part:

> I am renewing my subscription to your valuable pa r fo another year. I feel that I cannot do without it, and i hac to pay double the present price would not drop it.
>
> Mrs. K. M. Ha y.

Here is one from Florida that is full of confi nce

> Sorry the cost of paper is to be increased. But sir you cannot furnish the paper for the old price, I stand ready s one of the Herald Family to send an additional half-dollar any time to keep up the paper, and believe thousands of hem will do the same.
>
> Mrs. L. E. Fui r.

And here is one from Pennsylvania cont ning sentiments which we know are echoed in the he s of thousands of our friends throughout the countr

> I have no regret whatever at the advance in the pric the Christian Herald, but say, "go ahead and do it," so as con tinue giving us the best family and religious paper publi d at any price just as you have in the past. I only regr that humanity has fallen so low as to bring about conditio that make this advance necessary, as I know it is. You go a d in your good work, and when Mrs. Cornell renews it wi e at the prevailing price at that time.

Downrightness

THERE is a wide difference between the c ality of uprightness and that of downrightness, t ugh both may be illustrated in the character the same person. An upright man, who fears Go and tries to live a blameless and useful life, may be very worthy and estimable Christian citizen, jus and scrupulously honest in all his dealings, yet wit ittle force of character, lacking initiative, and uneq l to a great emergency. A downright Christian we ould regard as one who is positive in his beliefs, unsh able in his convictions, a man who goes straight the point where others would hesitate, one who is f less and will not halt at doing what he regards as his uty; the man for an emergency, and with the stuff i him that goes to make leaders. The churches need ore men who combine both characteristics. They need the kind of man who gives strength and enco agement to others; who will not be satisfied with rely leading a quiet, model life during the week and appearing regularly in the pew on Sunday, but ose zeal and downright earnestness cannot be sa fied unless he is helping to make things "come to ss." Zeal has been likened to a pot which is liable t boil over; but it is better to boil over than never t boil at all. The downright Christian is the positive e of the battery, the business end of the enterprise. e is the organizer who sets all the wheels to workin He welcomes difficulties and finds a real joy in ove oming. And his enthusiasm and downrightne are contagious, and will put new spirit into his cowc ers.

The Subjugation of Greece

GREECE is just now undergoing an expe nce which illustrates, in a most remarkable ay, what is happening to the small nation hat stand in the way of the great powers involved the present war. Greece chose to be neutral, and tri by every available expedient to keep out of the war The Allies, who profess to be the protectors of the s ller peoples, have shown the shallowness of their p fessions in their dealings with the helpless Greeks. rst they caused the resignation of the premier and c net who stood for peace, and forced upon the gover ent a revolutionary ministry friendly to their ow purposes. Next, they seized the Greek navy, disa ing some of the ships and landing their crews, wh on others they placed new crews and took ove the vessels to add to their own naval forces. Si ltaneously with this extraordinary proceeding, the lies took over the control of the principal railway the mails and telegraphs, and the stores of naval mat als, and assumed administrative charge of the pol in seaport cities. This work of stripping a weak ion of every semblance of governmental, military, val and civic authority, with a high hand, becaus the Allies want a road through Greece by which the can carry on their campaign in the Balkans, estab lies a parallel to the case of Belgium, with the ngle difference that Belgium stood ready to oppose ned resistance, while Greece, being disarmed, was lit ally powerless to strike a single blow for her indepen ce. Had Greece been able to resist, who can say th the Belgian parallel would not have been complete t the last sanguinary detail?

B wers Would Compromise

A REDUCTION in the amount of alcohol in beer was advocated by speakers at the twentieth annual convention of the Ma r Brewers' Association which elo: in Buffalo October 3. Hugh S. Fo secretary of the United States Bre ry Association, said the solution of whole liquor problem would be the ohibition of the sale of spirituous liqu s, and licenses for the sale of beers andght wines low in alcohol. Such a pro sition from such a sou will astound and frig en the average saloon-kee'r of the land. Mr. Fox who is an intelligent ma and from the liquor-dea s' standpoint fair and ve generous in his propo-ati, will find many who will agree with him. He wil ind, however, that the pla will not be practical nor ccessful. If the brew-ers re to enlist in a war to ext ninate distilled liquors, the istillers would make a fier war on them, and each wo l be damaged. It is not kely that many of the bre rs would sincerely enter e test for the prohibition of stilled spirits, for in mo of the cities they own fro thirty to seventy per cen of the saloons that sell wh y, brandy, and other spi ous liquors, as well as bee and wines, out of which the make a profit. The gre reason why Mr. Fox's pro osition will fail is that the merican people are be-lieving the teaching of science tha lcohol in small quanti-ties a poison, that it dam-age the individual and so-ciety and has been the source of uch misery, crime, in-effi ncy, disease and death, and are determined that it and all the institu-tio responsible for it must go. An aro ed public conscience has stirred su a storm of opposition to the liquor tra that beer and wines cannot be sav now from destruction. The ch h and temperance people will not co nt for a moment to a compromise on is question. They consider that it i question of right and wrong that ad ts of no compror ise, and that it inv ves this principle referred to by Ch t: "He that is not with me is against me (Matt. 12 : 30.)

C IZERO ZEODITA, daughter of the late Menelik, has been pro-cla ed Empress of Abyssinia. She is for years old. The empress succeeds En eror Lidj Jeassu, who has been de sed. Abyssinia is one of the most int sting nations of the earth. It is the Switzerland of Africa. It is one-thi larger than Great Britain. It oc ies the mountainous regions of th alley of the Upper Nile, extending to e lower end of the Red Sea and ov the watershed toward the Indian Oc n. The land is fertile, yielding th roducts of all climes, some of them th crops a year. Bananas, dates, su , cotton, grapes, oranges, lemons an offee all flourish, and on the table-la ; hay, oats and barley are culti-va d. Abyssinia is the only independ-en native state in Africa. It has fine pu improvements, modern agricul-tu implements, and many of the be conveniences of civilized living. Al sinia is the Ethiopia of ancient history. There is this reference to the land over which Outzero Zeodita now rules: "And behold, a man of Ethiopia." (Acts 8 : 27, 28.)

Enjoying the Sunset in Battery Park, New York

HOW glorious is the sun, how gorgeous is the sunset! That sun was shining before there was a Hudson River or Manhattan Island or a creature upon the earth. The sun looks so little as it sets and our earth so large to us. That red orb is nearly 93,000,000 miles away from us, is 850,000 miles in diameter, 106 times that of the earth, and in volume exceeds that of the earth 1,300,000 times, and in weight 325,000 times. Who wonders that men without God's revealed will would worship the sun? That was perhaps the first form of idolatry In 1526 the Spaniards on discovering Peru found the natives devout worshipers of the sun, the Incas, their monarchs, counting themselves children of that luminary. To these Peruvians the dawn was hope, the bright noonday power, the sunset death to be followed by a resurrection the next morning. In Plato's allegory he uses the sun in the heavens as the type of God. He says: "The sun is he who gives the seasons and the years; and is the guardian of all that is in the visible world, and in a certain way the cause of all things. Whether I am right or not God only knows, but whether true or false, my opinion is that in the world of knowledge the idea of good appears last of all, and is seen only with an effort; and when seen, is inferred also to be the universal author of all things beautiful and right, parent of light and the lord of light in this world, and the source of truth and reason in the other. This is the first great cause which he who would act rationally either in public or private life must behold." Plato got above the sun to its Maker, and in using the natural sun as the symbol of God, caught the Hebrew thought thus expressed: "For the Lord God is a sun and a shield." (Ps. 84 : 11.)

Woman Raises Cotton at 92

MRS. SARAH J. GORDON, ninety-two years of age, who lives near Commerce, Ga., brought to Commerce the other day a bale of middling cotton weighing 595 pounds, which was sold. Mrs. Gordon planted, hoed and picked every pound of this cotton herself, and kept the same stored in her home until it reached the price of fourteen cents, for which she was holding it. How the industry of this woman within eight years of a hundred shames the indolence of many young daughters of wealth and luxury who spend their lives on the latest fabric, the newest style of garments, the exciting rounds of amusement and social engagements, as well as those lazy daughters of poverty who sit around and do nothing while their mothers slave themselves to death for them! The mothers of both wealth and poverty are as much to blame as their indolent daughters. They ought to have sense enough to raise them better. After reading this incident of Mrs. Gordon, it might be well to turn to the Bible and read the wise man's description of the ideal woman: Prov. 31.

Swept Up Costly Jewel

JOHN CARTEN was sweeping up the floor of the lobby of the Hotel Majestic in New York the other evening when his eye met something sparkling. He picked it up, and it was a large diamond set in a lady's platinum ring. He gave the ring to John J. White, the clerk on duty at that time, who on account of its size thought the set was a "fake" diamond. He showed it to a jeweler, a guest of the hotel, who pronounced it a genuine octagonal four-carat diamond, worth $2,500 in cash. Christ takes a gem to illustrate the value of his religion. He says: "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, seeking goodly pearls: who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it." (Matt. 13 : 45, 46.)

Evangelist Drops Dead

THE Rev. Dr. Thomas C. Needham, a noted evangelist and Baptist clergyman, who during his career as a sailor narrowly escaped death many times, died on Sunday morning, October 1, ten minutes after he had preached to the congregation in Bethlehem Baptist Church in Philadelphia, of which he was pastor. He had just closed a sermon on "The Bible and Its Uses," and had stepped into the vestry to don his robes in preparation for a baptismal ceremony when he suddenly clasped his hand to his heart and without a word sank into the arms of John H. Dooley, a deacon who was assisting him. Death came almost instantaneously, according to the statement of several physicians who were called. Heart disease was the cause. Dr. Needham was a personal friend and strong supporter of Billy Sunday, and had been a coworker in evangelism with Dwight L. Moody and J. Wilbur Chapman. Dr. Needham's impelling motive was his passion for saving souls, than which there can be nothing more lofty or divine. Mr. John D. Rockefeller is reported to have said a week ago, after hearing his pastor in Cleveland preach a sermon on Paul, that if Paul had been living today he would have been a captain of industry. Paul, if he were living today, with the same convictions and call, would have no time for so little a thing as handling a concern with billions of dollars and millions of profits. When called to organize the church of the living God, and save the souls of men by the preaching of the Gospel, Dr. Needham copied Paul in his lifelong labor for souls, and illustrated this sentiment of the apostle: "For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." (I Cor. 2 : 2.)

Rhodes Scholars Sail

AMONG the 200 cabin passengers who sailed for London via Falmouth recently were thirty Rhodes scholars on their way to the university of Oxford for the fall term. Cecil John Rhodes, an Englishman who went to Africa and made his fortune in diamond mines and other enterprises, and had a tragic political history, left in his will a provision for the establishment at the university of Oxford, England, of sixty colonial scholarships (for male students) of $1,500 a year for three years. Twenty-four of these scholarships were to be given to Rhodesia, Cape Colony and Natal, and thirty-six to Australasia, British North America and the West Indian colonies. In addition to these, there were allotted two scholarships to each state and territory of the United States, and fifteen to Germany of $1,250 a year. No candidate was to be chosen or rejected on account of his race or religion. The requirements of candidates are mental ability and ambition, a certain literary preparation, proficiency in athletics, nobility of character, and kindness and unselfishness of spirit and action. Better than to have had a country named after him or to have accumulated millions was to have established these scholarships in the interests of the highest education and manhood. There is earthly immortality for the founder, and an eternity of influence for human development and betterment. The founder embodies this thought in his scholarships: "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding." (Prov. 4 : 7.)

Through the Orient for the Christian Herald

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—THIRD LETTER

Arrival at Yokohama

IT is a week since we waved good-by to the cerise sweater-coat on the Vancouver pier and left the twinkling lights of Victoria far astern. The calendar says it is eight days, but the calendar is wrong. Somebody took Wednesday, the nineteenth, and dropped it overboard while we were all asleep, and we lost three meals and a night's rest that we had paid for. On the way back last summer we had two Fridays, both the thirteenth of August.

We are in second-class; blown by the same breezes, sprayed by the same salt spume, and rocked by the same waves that blow, spray and rock Judge Elbert H. Gary, his wife, his valet, her maid and their score of trunks. The food is better than I am accustomed to, and the room is cleaner than it would be if I, instead of the patient, conscientious Chinese who has been assigned to the job, were the chambermaid. This kind of travel costs seven dollars and fifty cents a day, and in first-class, if they don't insist on the bridal suite, it costs them three times as much.

And this is Yokohama, but not all of it, though all of it is like this Looking around my comfortable second-class quarters, I have been puzzled to understand why missionaries, who live on very little a year, and who are not a luxury-loving class, should choose to travel first-class, as many do. The difference in price far outweighs the difference in comfort, and although the steamships give the missionaries a very substantial reduction from the first-class rates, the added transportation cost incurred on a two-weeks' trip is enough to pay a month's salary or support several native workers for a year.

The canal boat of Japan hasn't the lines of a gondola, but two men can operate it with ease, the author alleges (note the ease of the man near the bow!)

Missionary Travelers

I happen to be a healthy individual, and I can sit on a tossing boat and say truthfully that I have never been very seasick, whereas if I were a poor traveler, first-class with its added comforts would be none too good for me. If I were the mother of a lot of children, I would travel first-class if I had to sell my watch or even my camera to do it. If I were worn out with six years of hard labor in the foreign mission field, and felt the need of more attention than I could get in second-class, I would travel first-class, wherever the money it cost came from. But most of the young missionaries, going out for the first time to the field, are as healthy as I am, or they would not be appointed; and few are blessed with large families. They are going to countries in which, of necessity, they will have to undergo privations and forego comforts, and why they should prepare for such experiences by sleeping in the next stateroom to a captain of industry, or by paying for a fancy smoking-room and a café veranda, which they do not use, is one of the unsolvable conundrums of ocean travel.

At work among his treasures of brass, designed for Buddhist temples

For those who can afford it, first-class is fine. But an earnest missionary, going out to a difficult station, where he may give up a goodly part of his small salary to support needy students or pay helpers' salaries, could not afford to pay the difference between first and second-class fare out of his own pocket, and he ought not to feel that it is necessary for the Board to pay it for him. I have met old missionaries whose honorable service entitles them to the best, who rebel at such extravagance, while the real machinery of missions has to go at half speed for want of funds.

In the big affairs of missionary effort, the present generation of evangelists, teachers and doctors are as heroic as were Judson, Mackaye, Morrison or Hamlin. But in the minor matters of mission administration, some of them are utterly inexperienced. There is not one who is not leading a life of true service, and many are living sacrifices to a mighty cause. But there is as much petty politics in some mission stations as there is in a post-office building. The big problems are sometimes lost sight of in a mass of petty detail. Three denominations will run rather poorly equipped schools in the same field, and will teach chemistry and physics almost without equipment, rather than agree to let one adequately equipped school take the place of three weaklings.

The Critics of Missions

But much of the criticism of missions is absolutely unwarranted. If Christian missions are not justified in their major outlook, then life not justified. I speak with some ence, and after talking with traders and other disinterested persons, wh Christian missions are the finest e of American helpfulness and efficie our nation furnishes. Administerin do, new appetites and vices to tl ward nations of the world, the grea tidote and the grandest gift we are is in giving the knowledge of Chris peoples of the earth. No other make could offset the vices which civilization is carrying to the n races.

In many a populous city and lo lage, American missionaries are car their work. While a few may off people among whom they work by tude of superiority and aloofness show a friendship and a whole-soul fulness that has caused them to l tioned in many a stammered praye be loved by hundreds whom the served. Some doctors may have f that Christ healed without fee; b are others who have sacrificed their an heroic fight with plague and flood and famine. In its concept missionary plan is the most the most efficient and the m oughly Christian program ages. Christian missions, grand scope and splendid ment, will withstand all the c that flippant tourist or disap trader in vice can hurl at the in their minor points, many might be introduced. De tionalism, petty jealousy, the differences—these are the r mies to missionary efficiency.

The Picturesque Japanese at

Yokohama is a typical trea with a few fine buildings, a Bu foreigners. The foreign conc made up of two parts: th where the foreigners live, a Settlement, where they work. concessions and settlement characterized the relations the self-consciously superio pean and the shrewd Orie more than one occasion. But bluffs are not working as formerly, few concessions ar made, and those are made to entals, and settlements are There are a score of open q between the superior foreig the downtrodden native now.

whom are Chinese and ten per cent. of whom are Americans. Although the Japanese people resent the existence of foreign firms, much of the large trade of the port is handled by such firms. The finest residential and business districts in this city of four hundred thousand are occupied by the foreigners. If the foreigner is a superior type and necessary to commerce, this is a good thing. But if he is simply a parasite, living off the land, resentment may be well grounded.

Hotel life is bad enough anywhere, but it is worst in the Orient. You hear the mother of a twelve-year-old girl tell her to "run away while mother smokes," or tell her husband that she "will have a whisky and soda, and the little girl can have a small one, as the weather is hot." Such things happen in America, but they are not the normal thing as they are in the polyglot trade ports. The commercial class accuse the missionaries of being too exclusive, and the missionaries assert that they are not going to run a fancy bar to attract their compatriots—so there you are!

But if one will leave the hotel and the tourist office and the cocktail-drinkers and go out into the real native quarter, there are enough things to interest any one. One old man passes with his load of crickets, which sing in hot weather and are kept in cages like so many canaries. These gentle creatures make a noise like a squeaky axle and one hid under the hood of a twelve-passenger car would subject the most careful chauffeur to scorn. They are caught with bird-lime and make nice little pets, cheap to buy and not requiring gasoline for upkeep.

My rickshaw man is an old fellow whom I hired a year ago and who recognized me again. He is low-priced, speaks quite a little English, and has a sense of humor. I have him trained so that if we pass any one at unusual work, or go near any novel scenes, he points out these things to me. He knows my fondness for the Japanese children, who are the cutest tots on earth, with their gay clothes, slant eyes and bobbed hair, and if he sees an unusually bright dress or a fine child, he points them out with a sort of fatherly pride of race. At two years old the Japanese surpass all other nationalities in charm and attractiveness, and these sober yet happy little folk look as though they had strolled out of a toyshop.

Night Scenes in Yokohama

In most Oriental countries sunset brings quiet to the streets, and there is little night life. But on Theater Street, Yokohama, eleven o'clock at night sees the great crowds leaving the movies, which are close together, and the resulting scene is one never to be forgotten. Humanity packed too close for comfort surges in an unbroken tide from one end of the street to the other. Add to this mass of many-hued forms the taking down of the highly colored banners, and you have a scene that makes the dropping of the big top at home look like a side show.

Sometimes the lights on the water produce an effect almost Venetian in charm, but the bulky canal-boat lacks the artistic lines of the gondola, and the water sends forth a scent which might be called by a plainer name. The newspaper boy rushes through the narrow streets, hurling the sheets to right and left as he runs, and ringing the bells at his waist to announce his arrival.

The Japanese language is a nice little exercise, and I am going to try to learn enough phrases to make it possible for me to travel away from the tourist routes on my motorcycle. I remember my first experience with the language, which was my most successful one. It was the night of the lantern festival in Shimonoseki, and I had just arrived from Korea. I had been doing some rough traveling in north China and Manchuria and was ready to attempt the Japanese language. One delicious refreshment which the Japanese have is shaved ice, sprinkled with sugar or laved with syrup, and the man of whom I bought this delicacy could talk English. I had a better opinion of Japanese politeness then than I have now, as I had just had tea at one of the hotels of the Imperial Japanese Government Railway, so I asked the man how to say "Thank you." and "How much is it?" He told me, and I went down the street saying to myself, "Arigato; ikura dessuka."

Along came a group of young fellows who had had too much sake. One thought he would shoulder me, but I saw him coming and gave him my best football shove. Then, to be polite, I took off my hat and spoke the only Japanese I knew: "Thank you. How much is it?" thus using my entire vocabulary in one sentence. I now know six words instead of three.

Prayer and Bible study in the home of a native missionary, of whom we shall read in a later article

Wrestling with a Motorcycle

My main excitement yesterday was to learn to operate my motorcycle, which is a big, two-cylinder, three-speed affair. In setting the thing up I had flooded the cylinders. It took thirty-six hours to charge the battery with juice and thirty-six seconds to charge the charge on my bill. But yesterday, bright and early, I kicked the thing into throbbing activity and straddled the seat, let in the clutch and started off. The streets were narrow and unusually populous. In one place I tried to shut off the power, while I read the directions how to start it again; but all that happened was that the horn tooted. Just at this time I was rapidly approaching two wagons, which held the whole road. Lest I should speed the thing up instead of stopping it, I squirmed through a small opening and got by; but when I went to turn the next corner, I knew I would have to slow down, so I turned a handle. The machine jumped forward like a racing car and jumped a gutter and then turned turtle, with one of the valve rods popping up and down on my leg. It seemed as if three-fourths of the population of Yokohama came to watch me get up, which I did, with assistance. I then kicked the starter, turned valves and tooted the horn until the other fourth of the population came around to watch.

Up came a man who spoke some English, and who told me there was an engineer handy. I pushed the fourhundredweight of inactive metal to the place, used sign talk to say that the thing was "sick," and waited for the engineer to appear. He came out laden with enough hardware to wreck a dreadnought. I turned a key, kicked the thing once more, straddled it while the motor tried to jump over the handle bars, and let in the clutch. One jump and we were off. The machine was as much afraid of that engineer as I was. It ran like an affrighted thing.

After that it was easy. I have a healthy respect for that motor. I am going to make friends with it as soon as possible. Tomorrow I shall try to run it without gas. It is safer.

Co-Working With Omnipotence

WHY not do a Christ-like thing in a Christ-like way? That is, thoroughly.

If ever man can do a God-like act, it is in the lifting up of the oppressed. The civilized world today is aghast at the extent of the misfortune which has befallen great portions of the non-combatant population of Europe. Those who know the situation best and are most trustworthy in their reports declare that upon America rests the responsibility of preserving these peoples from extinction by starvation, disease and exposure.

Truly, here is a Christ-like thing to do in a Christ-like way—and that means to do it thoroughly.

We believe Christian Herald readers and their friends will be more than glad to have provided for them a way by which to give the most effective form of relief to the suffering millions of war's innocent victims in Europe.

We do not intend in this issue to tell again of the horrors that beset those hundreds of thousands who have been left destitute in the black wake of war. The fact that this immeasurable woe exists, and the fact that it will overwhelm men, women and children by the thousands if America does not stretch forth the helping hand, these facts are sufficient.

The one thing for Christian Americans to consider is how best to lift this burden of woe.

The Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments lay stress on the value of continuity in deeds of kindness. The Old Testament required the tithing of one's income. The New Testament urges the practice of a weekly allotment from our worldly goods for the benefit of others. This divinely recognized principle of effective Christian charity—regularity in giving—we now recommend for the almost superhuman task that confronts America. We shall continue to receive and disburse gifts that come to us for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe, with nothing but warm commendation for those who can give but infrequently and in small amounts. But at the same time, we are now opening special records in which we shall enroll all who will give regularly to this supreme cause, as an assistance to our friends in applying the principle of continuity of good deeds to this, the greatest of world charities.

The plan is simple. We have founded ten Monthly Offering Clubs (see below) in one or another of which we invite every member of the Christian Herald family and their friends to enroll. We shall keep the records and under each member's name will enter the regular monthly remittances made to the relief fund. Membership in these clubs is for one year, subject to withdrawal upon notice. The ten clubs are as follows:

Monthly Offering Club No. 1, donors of fifty cents monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 2, donors of one dollar monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 3, donors of two dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 4, donors of three dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 5, donors of five dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 6, donors of ten dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 7, donors of twenty dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 8, donors of twenty-five dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 9, donors of fifty dollars monthly.

Monthly Offering Club No. 10, donors of some amount monthly, determined by circumstances each month.

At convenient times there will be published in the Christian Herald a complete statement of the standing of these clubs, with names of members and amounts given to that date.

All that is necessary to do to become enrolled is to address the Treasurer of the Monthly Offering Club, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, giving your name and post office address and stating the amount which you have decided to try to give and whether weekly or monthly. You will at once be notified of your enrollment in the appropriate club.

These clubs are already in existence and members already enrolled. In our Thanksgiving issue we will publish the enrolment at that time with the amounts both subscribed and paid. We are confident that a large number of our readers will take advantage of this method to get under the terrible burden of these fellow children of our Heavenly Father, in remembrance of this admonition, "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Will you?

Now and then we receive letters from readers who wish to contribute to this relief fund provided they can be assured that the money is set promptly to work. From the beginning we have made remittances with all possible expedition as fast as the fund permitted, to one or another of our committees. We now have committees at work at twelve points; their faithful members are working and waiting; they administer the funds received with wisdom and kindness, and are constantly put to it to keep hope in the hearts of those who must still wait on as best they can for new gifts from America. We do not know of any way by which your gifts can reach these stricken districts more quickly or be administered better than through the committees representing the Christian Herald Relief Fund.

Swell this fund! Bear this burden—your privileged share of it! Send your gifts. Enroll.

Goodrich "STRAIGHT-LINE" are the longest wearing rubbers made and 20,000,000 pairs have proved it!

If you had witnessed a gigantic test wherein 20,000,000 pairs of one brand of rubbers actually wore as long as 40,000,000 pairs of other makes, you'd never buy any rubbers but the kind that had won out 2 to 1.

This test has been made. It began 10 years ago. And the 20,000,000 pairs of Goodrich "STRAIGHT-LINE" Rubbers have proved beyond question that they have "double the wear in every pair."

The Goodrich rubber in them—(the result of 47 years' experience)—is tough, almost as rawhide, yet light in weight. So "STRAIGHT-LINE" Rubbers are never clumsy—they are light upon the feet.

Compare their snug-fit and neat, stylish appearance, too —and note the superiority there.

38,000 stores sell these rubbers which "wear like Goodrich Tires." Why accept rubbers that do not?

Automobiling on Golden Roads

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just returned from a two-day automobile trip through some of the richest of the gold-bearing regions of interior Alaska. Fairbanks has produced almost one-third of all the gold we have gotten out of the territory. The sum is more than ten times the amount of Uncle Sam's purchase price. It is about $80,000,000, and the geologists say there are many millions to come.

This enormous quantity of gold has been washed from creeks and their valleys surrounding this city. The valleys are streaked with a bed rock which lies far down under the earth. The gold-bearing stratum is five or six feet in thickness, and it has an average value of more than $5 per cubic yard. There is so much of it that if it were confined to one strip, about five times as wide as a country road, the strip would reach as far as from New York to Philadelphia, and every mile of it would contain values to the amount of one and one-third million dollars.

Here you see the cleaning up process

The miners are still working on the oldest of the creeks, although in places they are almost deserted. We rode by log hotels and dance halls, now empty and silent; and passed great masses of gravel, the monuments of the work of the past. Leaving Fairbanks, we motored up one stream and down another, passing pile after pile of these tailings. We passed through villages, which were once almost cities, now going to ruin. Cleary is one of the richest of all the creeks of the Fairbanks district and today it is being mined along the greater part of its course. This is true of most of the creeks.

In the Nolan mine they were working at eighty-four feet from the surface. We got into a bucket, and were lowered down a well of that depth. From the bottom tunnels had been dug off into the ice-frozen gold-bearing rock. We left the bucket and walked through the tunnels, stopping now and then to watch the miners thaw out the strata. The work is done with steam points, or steel pipes through which steam is driven into the ice. The pipes are three-quarters of an inch in diameter. They have heads of solid steel, and below them connections with steam boilers outside. The boilers force the steam through rubber hose into the steel pipes. These end in points of steel in which are small holes to let out the steam. The pipes are driven into the frozen rock with steel hammers, working their way on inch by inch as the steam thaws out the ice. It melts the gravel for several feet about the pipe. The thawed stuff can then be dug down and thrown into wheelbarrows, which carry it to the shaft and the hoists.

At the Nolan mine they have a clean-up once a week. By this is meant that they wash out the gold at that time. The gold is washed in a trough which is perhaps a yard wide, a yard high and several hundred feet long. This box is the sluice box. It is made of rough plank, and is set up at an angle fi teen or twenty degrees, so that ru from the high crib containing the m to the ground. When the time t clean-up occurs, a door is opened t dump, and the gold-bearing grave ou down into the sluice box. A ea of water flows over it, forcing o ward and asl ing the d ar gravel a In the l to of the s ic box are ffl or crat steel w ic catch th ol The gol heavie ha the rock an and eart an it falls ir tl riffles a th stream sh the d ri away.

At fir th water co s a flood. ca ries the on gravel an an down w h rush. iv miners, c l rough clo in with rub e boots to he thighs, st d the curre an stir as h water pur down. e throw ou th big boul er and pitc an fork ove th mortar and sand. They stop it he an there with their shovels, so that eve bi of gold-dust is washed off. After im bits of the bottom are visible. In om places the box has turned yellow th gold dust has piled up and coat th boards. The riffles become filled ith black sand. This is mixed wit the yellow and now and then a small n get is to be seen. The riffles are lifte out and the black sand containing th old is washed over. This is carefully ne

The water now flows slowly ar the men agitate it with brushes of se eed of, about the size of a whisk-b om With these they separate most the sand from the dust and the yellow our and grains are caught in a scoop nd thrown into a pan. It covers th ot-tom of the pan like a coarse cor eal and looks somewhat as though it ere yellow corn ground. The clean- of this week amounted to about ree quarts of gold.

After getting the gold out of th ox we took it into the office cabin ne by and dried it over a fire. It was en tossed up by the miners to blov ut the bits of sand that were left. ey did this, throwing the gold int the air, much as you throw screenin to chickens, blowing the black sand ay and catching every bit of the go in the pan. At the end the sand w all out and the yellow gold only was ft. This was the clean-up of a small ne, and worth over $4,000. Larger an-ups sometimes run into the te of thousands of dollars.

CLEARY CREEK has many exc ent claims. I am told there are p es where you can walk up the valley nd every foot under you will be th $2,500. The creek altogether has ro-duced about $24,000,000 worth of ld, and it is estimated that there is ore gold in the ground than has yet en taken out.

NEARLY all of the gold taken o of the ground about Fairbanks as been placer gold. This means it is de up of gold dust and nuggets scat ed rou the earth and gravel, so that it ha o be only washed to get the old . Of quartz gold, which comes om ins or other particles of gold d in and mixed with the solid rock, is region has as yet produced ttle, lthough several quartz mines are n working.

Th nost of the gold of Alaska has come om placers. The total value produ d is now about $280,000,000, and h almost $200,000,000 has come from e placers. The greater part of the q rtz gold has been and still is from e great mines of southeastern Alask and especially those of Treadwel al Juneau. Some of those mines wil producing for a century to come and t y are now yielding millions of llar year.

Th emainder of Alaska so far has een a large extent a placer gold opo ion, and the placer output at resen is about ten million dollars per r. Much of this comes from mines ike t Nolan mine I have described, ut ch also comes from the dredges ow rking on the Seward peninsula, nd e ecially about Nome. The Seward p insula is estimated to have more n hree hundred million dollars' worth f gold still left in its gravels.

Pla r mining in Alaska is far different f m that of other parts of the nite States. In California and in he R kies all that a miner needed to tart isiness was a pick, a shovel and pan wash out the gold. He might dd aocker or some other rude pieces of m hinery, but all told the outfit tle. The free gold lay on the op o he ground, or on the banks and h beds of the creeks, and it was omp atively easy to find and wash ut. ere about Fairbanks more than p cent. of the productive deposits ie at rom 40 to 260 feet underground, and st of them are in valley bottoms hich re solidly frozen and have to be haw out before you can find where he g l is or get it.

Th whole country is covered with moss, which must be stripped off to find what lies beneath. To test the ground you have to go down to bed rock. The result is that a prospector's outfit is much more costly than in the Rockies. It should include a small boiler for steam thawing with steam pipes, rubber hose, steam points and steam fittings. One needs a windlass, a cable and wooden buckets to get the earth out after it is thawed, and if he expects to prospect in deep ground he should have a steam engine as well. They have here a prospecting outfit which costs about $600. It consists of a four-horsepower boiler, a hoisting engine, steam points, pipe and fittings and buckets and cable. The outfit is compact and can be carried on a sled drawn by dogs. One of the best methods of prospecting is with drills, but the freight rates have been so high that few have come in. There is a churn drill built here, which is sold for $1,600, including therein a complete prospecting equipment.

HOW would you like to stub your toe on a gold mine? That is how the Rhoads-Hill quartz mine in Bedrock Creek valley was discovered. The discoverer, L. B. Rhoads, a prospector who was mushing over the trails, stubbed his toe and fell headlong. As he got up he looked for the cause of his stumbling, and found it was a rock speckled with coarse yellow bits of gold. He marked the spot, got an outfit, and dug down until he discovered a rich vein of quartz. He took out a claim, and thawed a shaft to the fifty-foot level, burning the rock with wood fires. Every week he crushed enough of the best rock to give him gold for his supplies for the week to come. In the winter he worked underground. The next spring he tunneled in on the vein; and, to make a long story short, he finally established a mill of five stamps, out of which he and his brother-in-law have already cleared almost a quarter of a million dollars.

A Hallowe'en Reverie

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

LE'S run away from the city from ie noise and tumult, from the ramping of feet and the whirr of affi Let's run away from work, and urr and the little everyday worries at et us. Let's run away from row p cares and grown-up responsi- liti Let's run down the dusty utu n road, where the falling leaves e king a gold and scarlet path for s, a let's keep running until we reach he hd of childhood. For it's Hal- lowe time.

D ou remember how we waited for Hall e'en to come, back there in the and f childhood? How we counted e ys, a shimmering golden-blue trea of them, all through October? How ve looked wistfully up at the clo ecked sky and hoped with the reat ess hope of childhood that it oul 't rain? Who ever heard of a rainy Hallowe'en, anyway? Do you reme ber how we raked up the crum- ed aves that lay brownly on the awn uge piles of them, so that we migh build great glowing fires—fires that umed up suddenly into immense ouri heaps of molten gold, and, just as udd ly, collapsed into sizzling piles of gray hes flecked with red dashes of fire?

H owe'en is the mystic time of hild od, the unreal time when witches, and ooks, and black ghost-cats roam t w through the earth. It's the time he he moon shines ghastly white on e vine-grown graveyard. Do you me ber how our teeth chattered, back ther n the land of childhood, and how ou tched my hand and whispered in sca d little voice, "Let's run fast— ! There's nothin' there but tomb- ston They can't hurt us—course hey n't! But let's—run!" And do ou member how we ran and ran be- caus omething—moved? Of course it as ly the moonlight, but——

A D there was the Hallowe'en party Gracie's house. We were all ngl anxious to go to that party, 'cause it was a different sort of a party, not at all like the formal parties where the little boys wore patent-leather pumps and blue serge suits, and the little girls were resplendent in stiff white dresses with colored sashes. Gracie's mother had said, "Come in your oldest clothes—clothes that won't spot—that won't get soiled!" And we came, arrayed not at all like the lilies of the field, in ginghams and colored pinafores and stubby-toed little boots. Remember how we laughed when Jimmy—Jimmy was that tall boy with red hair and freckles and a wide smile—came dressed in his blue denim overalls? He was going to have a good time, all-righty, he said.

It was an awfully nice party, that party of Gracie's. We ducked for apples in a huge bowl filled with the splashiest water! The apples were big and round and red-cheeked, and they floated so high at the top of the bowl that every one thought they'd be easy to get at. But my, as soon as your teeth got anywhere near them they bobbed down again, clear to the bottom, and you came up choking, with your eyes and nose and mouth full of water! Remember how Mary's hair curled in tight little rings wherever the water touched it? And remember how mine hung in my eyes until it got dry?

There were other games too, games where we had to jump over candles; but Gracie's mother made us stop playing those games. She said that it made her nervous to see us playing with fire. Our skirts, she said, might catch—they were such flimsy little skirts. And so we stopped playing with the candles and went into the kitchen and made sticky molasses candy. It was good—oh, so good! But we were glad in our hearts, as we made it, that Gracie's mother had told us to wear old dresses. For it spilled on us, that candy, and it stuck. Do you remember how it caught in Helen's long black curls, and how she

THE MITCHELL CABRIOLET

Only 500 Built

Go See the Many New Ideas

If you have any interest in luxury cars, go visit your Mitchell showroom. Go now, for only 500 of these extra-fine cars have been built. And even our largest dealers get but a few of them.

They are winter cars and year-round cars designed for the coming Shows. And the only luxury bodies ever designed under John W. Bate, the famous efficiency expert.

New Mitchell Prestige

John W. Bate has made the Mitchell factory the model efficiency plant. His methods have cut our factory cost in two. And the Mitchell car, because of those methods, offers 20 per cent extra value.

In the Mitchell car he has worked out over 700 improvements. He has given every part 50 per cent over-strength. He builds 440 parts of toughened steel. He uses a wealth of Chrome-Vanadium steel. He has attained here a lifetime car.

Now for months he has applied that same genius for efficiency to the perfecting of luxury bodies. This to give to the Mitchell a new prestige. And we urge you to see the results.

Three Year-Round Models

One new model is a Limousine, such as you never saw. One is a superb Coupe. But the most interesting models will probably be the three that are built for all weathers.

One is a Springfield Type Sedan, with seats for seven. The plate glass sides can be dropped in a moment, and you have an open touring car.

The Cabriolet changes in the same way to an open Roadster.

Then we have a new style of demountable top which fits on the Touring Car.

With any of these models, one car serves for all seasons, all weathers.

Mr. Bate's experts, before designing these models, examined 257 new models, built in Europe and America. They saw every attraction that others embodied in a luxury car.

In these Mitchell models all the attractions are combined. And many new ones are added. So you will find here dozens of features which no other one car has.

See them at your local Mitchell showroom. Your dealer has only a few of them, and they will not last. You'll regret it if you miss them.

cried? She was so proud of her curls, was Helen. She is still.

We had refreshments then, and the refreshments were different, too. We had sweet cider in great mugs, and huge spicy doughnuts sprinkled with powdered sugar, and nuts and raisins, and fruit and pumpkin pie. And we sat in front of the fire and told scary stories, and then somebody, dressed in black and gray and yellow like an old witch, came shuffling in, and some of us were so—surprised—that we screamed, almost. The witch had a black cat under her arm and a broomstick in her hand, and she said they were magic. But we knew—didn't we?—that the broom was Gracie's broom, and that the cat was old Mrs. Muller's fat black pussy. And then the witch, whose painted face, under the straggly wig, looked sort of like—well, sort of familiar—said she'd read our palms and tell us our future. And Jimmy—you know, the one with the awful nice smile—whispered almost aloud:

"Huh, I wish I'd a washed my hands!" And we all laughed, just a little nervous-like.

And then do you remember, just before we went home, how they dared us to go down the dark cellar stairs with a mirror and a candle? You know how it's done—when you get at the foot of the stairs you shut your eyes and say a charm and light the candle and look deep into the shiny glass. And in the glass you're sure to see your fate!

Do you remember how our knees felt just a little shaky as we walked down the stairs? And how our fingers trembled as we lit the candle, and our voices were a little quivery as we said the charm?

And then, oh, then, do you re[illegible]mbe how we gazed into the shiny mi[illegible]r an saw the Smith boy, the one th[illegible] wa cross-eyed, laughing foolishly [illegible] u And do you remember how the [illegible]enin was nearly spoiled for us, then? [illegible]Caus we couldn't think of marryi[illegible] tha Smith boy!

DO you remember how sh[illegible] th moon was when we walke[illegible]back It was almost our first evening[illegible]part and we felt so grown up! And o[illegible] litt escorts, silent, very conscious [illegible] the hands, felt grown up too. And [illegible] we all too bashful to say much, bu[illegible] th gate we lingered and looked [illegible] eac other, and then we flushed, and [illegible]ne the boys half whispered:

"Can I see you home from [illegible]urc Sunday?"

And we felt awfully important[illegible] An then we went in and crept thro[illegible]h th silent hall, and jumped into be[illegible] An the Hallowe'en moon shone thro[illegible]h th curtain, and we were much too [illegible]ed t sleep, and somehow—our eyes [illegible]elt little heavy—and the moon was [illegible]smi ing . . . And we wondered if h[illegible] woul be waiting for us after church . [illegible] an if the other girls would—laugh[illegible] An we were sort of drifting—in the [illegible]moon light . . .

Among the Workers

THE Presbyterian Synod of Missouri under the leadership of the Committee on Evangelism began, in September, a year's forward movement which, it is hoped, will do much to extend the work of the church and to make it more efficient. The time until January will be given to preparation. The plans of the movement will be explained and unfolded to the pastors and to the churches. Each local church will then work out its own program in relation to the general plan. Following a Rally Day in each church, there will be organized personal workers' classes, Gospel teams and cottage prayer meetings and workers will be given special instruction in personal work and special preparation for definite service.

Beginning with January the program will enter upon the evangelistic period. All of the regular services and activities of the church will be used for soul-winning. Personal work will be emphasized by efforts to get all church members to pledge themselves to "win one." Evangelistic services will be conducted by Gospel teams and men's Bible classes. All the normal and special evangelizing effort is to be brought to a focus in the two weeks preceding Easter.

After Easter the emphasis will be laid on the conservation of the results and the training of new Christians, and older ones as well, for efficient church membership and holy living.

EVANGELIST French E. Oliver opened a Union Tabernacle campaign in Bellingham, Wash., September 24. Seventeen churches united in the campaign.

THE Northern Baptist Convention has adopted "The Two Americas" as the theme for educational work for 1916–1917. Mission studies for the Sunday schools have been arranged in three groups: the Home Mission Period, October 1 to December 25, given to the seeing of Latin North America without leaving home; the Foreign Mission Period, January 1 to April 8; and the Publication Society Period, April 9 to June 10. Material for the second period will be ready early in December, and for the third, March 15. The work is under the direction of the Department of Missionary Education, of which Rev. John M. Moore, 23 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York City, is secretary.

Saved to Serve

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WHAT a dramatic account we have here of a wreck and the scenes on shore! The cold, gray, drizzly dawn and the straining eyes of the seamen, who did not recognize the land. The anxious questions of the soldiers: would they reach shore alive through that surf? Would the natives prove savage? Would the prisoners escape? At last the captain discovers a little bay with a sandy beach and the hope of running the vessel ashore in safety is bright. But as they rushed before the wind they struck a treacherous bar thrown up by two cross-currents in the bay, and ran hard and fast aground off shore. So violent was the gale that the ship began to break up under the assaults of the waves.

The centurion's respect for Paul now saved his life and those of the other captives also, as the soldiers proposed to kill the prisoners, for whom they were answerable against escapes with their own lives. But at Julius's command those who could swim plunged in and helped the non-swimmers to get hold of planks and spars. By a real miracle two hundred and seventy-six people get safely to shore. That in itself was a wonderful answer to Paul's prayer for his companions after which he had so confidently assured them. What a story it is!

The Place Where Two Seas Met

THE ledge or sand-bar where the Alexandrian ship came to grief is typical of certain danger points in our voyage of life. It was a danger spot at the juncture of opposing currents. How often we ourselves are caught between two strong tendencies in life and tossed this way and that! How hard a place it is where love and duty seem to come into direct conflict! How many men of good instincts have gone to pieces on that rock of covetousness, where big profits and humane love of one's neighbor as himself clash! Jesus spoke as often and as severely of covetousness as of any other danger to the soul. How frequently in the lives of earnest young Christians the full tide of a growing Christian purpose comes upon a nasty eddy of self-indulgence! How unhappy you are till you get out of the current of mere pleasure-seeking, and get back into the open fairway of doing the will of God! Between two currents the sand piles up and the ships break to pieces. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Keep clear. Launch out into the deep!

Losing Your Ship

SOME on planks, some on broken pieces, all escaped safely to land. But what a way to make port at last—empty-handed, drenched, exhausted! Ah, the captain blundered when he tried to make Phœnix. He took too great a chance when that soft south wind blew. It is a great disgrace for a sailor to lose his ship, to fail to bring in his cargo. And so, too, it is a great disaster for a Christian to be barely saved—and that's all. To be sure, in the measureless grace of God, we may blunder and sin our way along in life, and yet perhaps make at last our desired haven. As Paul said, in a different metaphor, take heed how you build. Some build gold, silver, precious stones; others, wood, hay, stubble. The fire tests every man's work what it is. A man's work may be valueless, soon destroyed, yet he himself saved—so as by fire. How much nobler so to build that our work endures, to the shelter and blessing of others, long after we have finished what was given to us to do! "The work of our hands establish thou it."

Boys and girls, you start out on this voyage of life with glorious prospects. Your ship is stanch and true. You have your chart and compass. Jesus Christ will pilot you. Your cargo is precious—of hopes of service, of generous deeds, of the great inheritance of faith and love given you, of the ministries of the church and the home and this great world of God's. Yet it is entirely possible for you to be shipwrecked except ye watch and pray. How frightful to be lost! How humiliating to be safe on shore at last, sin-soaked and sorrowful, and to have lost your ship and all the precious freight you might have brought in! Trusted to you, too; for others have labored and you have entered into the reward of their labors. Yours is the responsibility of the captain, of the steward—to save not youself merely, but all those things committed to your care.

Unexpect d Kindness

TO the Græco-Romans all others were mere barbarians. Consequently these shipwrecked men distrusted the natives. But they showed uncommon kindness, received them all, built a great fire on the shore, and began to help the chilled castaways. Friends indeed! Well, a great many people are astonished to receive kindnesses nowadays. And unexpected kindnesses are doubly sweet. I read a while ago in the Boy Scout's Magazine, the tale of a poor old man who was often tormented by thoughtless boys. Imagine his astonishment when, at Thanksgiving time, the Scouts dropped in for half a day, cleaned his hut, chopped wood, repaired his broken door, and left a generous supply of eatables. The tale closed with the old hermit on his knees before God, probably for the first time in years.

Don't you suppose those lads were happy that day? How sweet it is to do good! How greatly blessed it is to give! It always pays, too—if you do not do it for the sake of the pay! Take the case of these natives. They helped the shipwrecked passengers ashore, warmed them at the fire, hospitably took care of a large number of people. But in return, within a few days, they heard the new message which was to transform the whole world, they enjoyed the close friendship of the greatest man then living; and all their sick were blessed by the great Physician of whom he taught, and by the beloved Luke, his servant.

Snap-Judgments

THESE kindly disposed people were just as likely to make false estimates of their fellow men as any of us. Even kind people will gossip and will pass snap-judgments on others. Around the fire these castaways gathered. Up came a man with a short chain on one hand. "A prisoner!" the natives murmured. As he put his sticks on the blaze a viper, aroused by the heat, sank its teeth in his hand. "A murderer!" the good people said. "He has escaped the waves, but Nemesis follows him. Wait a few minutes and you'll see him fall dead." When nothing of the sort happened, they changed their minds, and with equal unreasonableness whispered, "He is a god!"

What foolish judgments the world makes! "A murderer!" when he was about to save life after life on that island. A prisoner, yes, but a "prisoner for Jesus Christ." The chain on the hand, the stigma on the life, the halt in the gait like Jacob's—these things disfigure people on every side, but do not put the worst possible interpretation on them. Be charitable.

Then they rush to the other extreme. "A god," because the snake bite did not kill. But frequently such bites are unaccountably innocuous. He was no god, but he was a man of God, and God was guarding him. And Paul—well, he just went on picking up sticks. He paid no attention to the crowd, whether they called him an assassin or demigod. He shook off what "they say" just as he shook off the viper, and stuck to his task. We must not pay any attention to thoughtless gossip, if our consciences are clear. Even when we do good, people Visitor: I hope I have not disturbed you on wash day, Mrs. Blank, but I have been so eager to see you and I'll be in the city only for the day.

Housekeeper: Come right in Miss Dash, it is wash day but that makes no difference. We have been using Fels-Naptha for the last six months, and wash day is just as easy as any other day. Did you ever use Fels-Naptha? I wouldn't be without it.

Smell the naptha in each bar of Fels-Naptha soap, test the foamy white suds, and bury your head in the fragrant fresh white clothes as you take them from the line.

You'll enjoy Fels-Naptha wash day. The easy way to wash is the Fels-Naptha way with cool or lukewarm water, whether you try it on workmen's overalls or on net dresses. The directions are so remarkably easy and you will find them inside the red and green wrapper. Every day can be calling day when you use Fels-Naptha.

Make up your mind to test a bar of Fels-Naptha and you'll see how easy it is to save clothes, cash, and work.

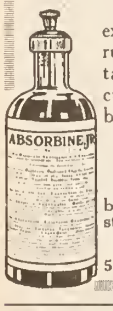
For Swollen Veins

Absorbine Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT
TRADE MARK REG U S PAT OFF

That Absorbine, Jr., would relieve Varicose Veins was discovered by an old gentleman who had suffered with swollen veins for nearly fifty years. He had made many unsuccessful efforts to get relief and finally tried Absorbine, Jr., knowing its value in reducing swellings, aches, pains, soreness.

Absorbine, Jr., relieved him, and after he had applied it regularly for a few weeks he told us that his legs were as smooth as when he was a boy and all the pain and soreness had ceased.

Thousands have since used this antiseptic liniment for this purpose with remarkably good results.



Absorbine, Jr., is made of oils and extracts from pure herbs and when rubbed upon the skin is quickly taken up by the pores: the blood circulation in surrounding parts is thereby stimulated and healing helped.

may say viperish things without really meaning much. Such snakes never hurt a true servant of the Lord. Our critics will understand better soon.

The All-Around Ministry

WHAT a rounded personality we have in this Paul! He fits in everywhere, on sea or shore. He is ready for the humblest task of bringing in firewood, but he is not afraid to preach the Gospel to King Agrippa himself. One paragraph shows him gathering wood so zealously that people noticed him. The next shows him praying with the chief dignitary of the neighborhood and curing his sickness. But he was just as willing to lay his hands on the simplest peasant too. And while nothing definite is said of it, we know him well enough already to be sure that he won converts to the Gospel of good-will during that strange winter spent on a little island in the midst of the sea.

Ready for humblest task—therefore ready for greatest. As you meet the daily trial, so you will meet the opportunity of a lifetime. If you have God on board in fair weather he will not desert you in the storm. Yes, disaster and danger may be your lot, but your consecrated soul is in his keeping. All's well!

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Our Question Box

F. W. Would be pleased if you would print a list of Sunday school class names that would be suitable for girls about eight or nine years of age.

Every Sunday school class should have not only a class name, but a class motto, class colors, a class pin, a class aim, and sometimes a class poem or song. All this will promote class spirit. For illustration, for a class of small girls:

Name: Buds of Promise. Motto: "Remember now thy Creator." "The rose is fairest when 'tis budding new." (Scott.) Aim: The cultivation of beauty of heart. Colors: Green or pink and gold.

Name: I'll Try Band. Motto: "Stick to your aim." (Holmes.) Colors: Green and gold. Class Song: "If at first you don't succeed." Aim: To keep on trying, no matter how often we fail.

Name: Busy Bees. Motto: "We gather honey every day from every opening flower." Color: Brown. Aim: To make life sweet for ourselves and others. To show others we can be both busy and happy at the same time.

Name: Daisy Class. Motto: "Whosoever shall give a cup of cold water" (Matt. 10:42), or "Little starry daisies to remind us of the sky," or "Small service is true service." Colors: White and gold. Aim: To make our kind acts, like the stars and daisies, innumerable. To look upward always like our emblem the daisy.

Name: Pleasant Words Circle. Mottoes: "Gentle words, quiet words are the most powerful words." "Pleasant words leave a song in the heart." Colors: White and gold. Aim: To show the value of pleasant words and the good effect they have on others. Class Song: "If you have a pleasant thought, pass it on."

Other suggested class names for young scholars are: "Good Cheer Circle," "Sunbeams," "Standard Bearers," "Golden Hours Class."

Mrs. G. H. D. I see in the Herald plans and ways of conducting Sunday school classes of all ages, but I would like to know how to superintend a ladies' Senior class. Please give me something along this line.

First, organize the class with a teacher, president, and other officers, and a Social, Devotional, Visiting and Missionary Committee. Write to Marshall A. Hudson, Syracuse, N. Y., for plans of the Philathea classes, which are ladies' organizations. Write also to your State Sunday School Secretary for the literature on organized Adult Classes.

Of course, select a class name, pin, motto, song, colors, flower, and aim. Suggested names for a ladies' class are: "The Anti-Can'ts," "The Best-You-Can-Do Class," "Persistency Class," "Ruth Circle," "King's Daughters" or "Royal Daughters," "Charity Circle," "Ruths and Lydias," "Constant Workers," "Lend-a-Hand," "Good Will Circle," "Gleaners," "Hope Circle." Select some definite form of missionary service for the class.

A. R. J. Our church is small, in a moderately large town. Sunday school numbers about 45, average attendance. Several classes use Graded Lessons. But we run short of teachers and especially teachers capable of graded work. My idea is, the school would be much happier and more efficient if all classes studied one lesson, graded in some simple fashion for different ages. In this way classes could be "doubled up" and fewer teachers required. Is this being done? Is it commendable?

For your help and the help of many other workers who have the same problem in the small school, the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, has issued a series of departmental graded lessons, that is, one lesson for each department or class of the departmental age—there is a lesson for those 9 to 12, another for those 13 to 16, and so on. But there is in preparation the very thing you are suggesting, namely, graded uniform lessons.

Young People's Topics for November 5

The Consecration of Social Life

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic (Consecration Meeting). 1 Cor. 9 : 19-23

PAUL was willing to be all things to all men in order that he might "save some." He was willing to be gay, to eat, to drink, to converse, to do anything usual in social intercourse, provided it broke no divine law and provided he might thereby bring some immortal soul into definite saving relationship with the Christ.

Much of our social life of to-day is based upon an attempt to be all things to all men in order that we may be considered a good fellow. Even social life within the church is frequently lacking in the one element which Paul put first, although he mentioned it last—that he might "save some." We sometimes hear it said that if you put too much emphasis upon the religious element you destroy the sociability of an occasion, and drive people away. On the other hand, it cannot be emphasized too strongly that nothing attracts humanity so much and nothing holds them so completely as the pure Gospel of salvation from sin through the blood of Jesus. It is true that a certain type of unrepentant sinner will foregather with us so long as we do not mention religion, and will sedulously avoid any association which is likely to develop the question of personal responsibility for individual conduct. We do not help ourselves to reach this class by catering to them. We cannot, of course, inject an evangelistic appeal into all of our social gatherings, but we can create in and about all of our comings together an atmosphere of clean thought, of high purpose, and of unselfish willingness to serve, which will prepare those who come to the church for its social advantages to receive its full message in the more formal meeting in which the appeal to the heart enters naturally.

On a Still Hunt for Souls

Epworth League Topic. John 1 : 40-47

THERE is one thing necessary in a still hunt, and that is complete readiness to meet the object of the hunt suddenly and unexpectedly. No one ever goes on a still hunt for something whose position he knows, but he arms himself fully and creeps along stealthily and moves quietly until suddenly the object hunted is found. Then immediate action is necessary, for often the hunter will otherwise become the hunted. The stalking of big game is an exciting enterprise, but neither so exciting nor so full of rich reward as the stalking of the human soul. From the very beginning of Christian history, those who had found Christ made it their next business to bring some one else to know him. Andrew had no more begun to follow Jesus than he went in search of his own brother Simon, and Philip did not permit the sun to set before telling Nathanael that he had found him of whom "Moses . . . and the prophets did write." The early Christian Church owed its amazing spread very largely to the telling abroad by each Christian of the message of salvation. The salutation of a Christian in those days when a stranger was encountered was usually some form, often mystical, as in using the sign of the fish, of the question, "Are you a Christian?" Sometimes it led to martyrdom. More often it made it possible for the Christian to tell to the other the story of the unsearchable riches of God in Christ Jesus.

In this fair land it is an honorable thing to be a Christian, and true faith and consecrated living need no disguise among the world of men. But there are still dark places where the light has not yet shone, and it is yet possible for us to make a still hunt for the souls that love darkness rather than light.

Pgress of the Bible Picture Contest

ARTICIPANTS in the Bible Picture Contest must not expect a quick decision by the Committee dges. These are all very busy men, yet they have willingly undertaken ire now engaged upon the arduous of considering the different answers aitted. But the best of men with best of intentions must be allowed in giving such a mass of material onsideration it requires. There were l about 10,000 different answers aitted, and each such separate verse be separately considered.

any contestants have doubted our ment that almost 10,000 different s were submitted for the 60 pic- . They reason that as there are verses in "Gems from the Bible," eater number of answers than this d be impossible. We are glad to in this fully. For Picture No. 1, instance, one contestant selects iel 5 : 16 as an answer. This same is selected by a second contestant ay Picture No. 4, and again by a contestant for Picture No. 16, etc. one verse would thus be among the ers given for Picture No. 1, Picture 4 and Picture No. 16, and therefore ars three times in the tabulated list ifferent verses. Some verses were n as answers for a dozen pictures.

Woman Suffrage Coming in 1917?

ple who question whether the anchisement of women is in accord God's will.

If all of these could have the erience of one clergyman I know, would be convinced of their error. s man was in charge of the only ch in Laramie, Wyoming, when 870 the women voted for the first . He went all over the town calling is church members and on all others the gentler sex and asking them ther they intended to vote. Every answered No. He said that if he had d a woman so unprincipled, so minine, so lost to Christian duty, o say she intended to vote, it was his pose to read St. Paul's admonition omen and to pray with the mistaken er. Shortly after the visitation from clergyman, a woman was told by husband that the man who was ning for sheriff, and who stood for protection of everything bad, was to be elected, because he boasted t he had the votes of all the bad nen in town. The wife went calling t afternoon. Next day all the nen went calling, and none told r husbands. For once, at any rate, nen showed they could keep a ret. Election day came and every nan in Laramie voted. As it was a thing, separate ballot boxes were vided. When the men's votes were nted, the candidate who stood for ation of law was elected by a large jority. When the women's votes e counted, the candidate who stood law and order was elected by so very ge a majority that these votes added hose cast for him by the men elected good candidate. My minister friend amazed. He told me that he went ne and read St. Paul's words again l somehow they didn't mean the e thing. And he's been an ardent fragist ever since.

'So will all other church people when y realize that every evil is fully ranchised. The saloon, gambling, ry form of vice has votes. But the rch is disfranchised, because women npose more than a majority of the rch membership, and only the nority of church members are now itled to vote. Those who want vir- to reign in this country must see t the churches are enfranchised. In ler to paint the United States white, must reach the church folks 'back me.'"

MARY KENDALL HYDE.

THE Other Side of the Question," by Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, President tional Association Opposed to Woman ffrage, will be given next week.

We Must Add $175 to the HUDSON SUPER-SIX

Here is an issue which we can't evade. So we meet it fairly and frankly, but give you a full month's warning. Every Super-Six will be sold at present prices while they last. If you can get one, get it.

The Super-Six of the present series is built from materials contracted last year. There are only 3500 more to go out, including open cars and enclosed. And part of them are sold.

The next production—starting December 1—will be like the present models. The changes, if any, will be only minor refinements. But materials for that series were contracted this year, and at prices enormously advanced.

So the cars now in process are the only Super-Sixes we can deliver at the present Hudson prices. The advance will be $175 per car.

No Way Out

Most people know that Hudson profits are amazingly low for our output. Here is the top-place car—the largest-selling fine car in the world with a price above $1100. Yet it sells way below some fine cars. Still our standards are so high that, despite our big output, profits are very small.

Now these high-grade materials, in one year, have enormously advanced. We must either adopt lower grades of materials, or add the advance to our price.

There is no other way out for fine-car makers whose profits have been fair. This enforced raise means no greater profit to us. So we frankly state the facts.

We shall continue the present-grade Hudson. Next year's models will be the same as this year's; save perhaps in some minor refinements. There will positively be no change in the Super-Six motor. So the added cost—and that alone—will be added to our price.

Good News for Owners

This will be good news for owners. About 25,000 have, or will get, Super-Sixes at present prices. With this patented motor, where wear and friction are almost eliminated, depreciation is a trifle. And like cars, of the next production, will cost a great deal more. So a Super-Six can be bought now at a saving of $175.

We have under way of the present production about 3500 cars. Part are open models, part enclosed. Many of them are sold.

But many Hudson dealers, suspecting the advance, have unsold Super-Sixes. If you get one now, you will save $175. For all Hudson dealers will advance the Super-Six when we start production of the next series.

If you can get one now, go get it.

Next Year's Ruling Car

Next year, as this year, the Hudson Super-Six is certain to hold its supremacy. The Super-Six is controlled by our patents—the motor which added 80 per cent to efficiency. So other cars can't use it.

The Super-Six now holds all the worth-while records. All the world's stock car records up to 100 miles. It holds the 24 hour record of 1819 miles. It won the Pike's Peak hill-climb—the world's greatest event of its kind.

In September it won the ocean-to-ocean record. It went from San Francisco to New York in 14 hours 59 minutes less time than the next best record.

It won all these records because of endurance. Because this invention has so nearly eliminated all friction, vibration and wear.

So every man who knows the facts must concede the Super-Six supremacy. Every test has proved it. If you want such a car—even for next year—now is the time to get it, if you can.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THERE are three experiences in the Christian life, the thrill of which can never be forgotten. The first is when we have the assurance of God's forgiveness and his acceptance of us; the next, when our efforts to win another soul to Christ are crowned with success; and the third, when we realize in our daily life that God is not far off, but very near to all who trust in him, and that he not only hears but answers the prayer that comes before him on the wings of faith. For such experiences we shou'd not fail to give God the glory, and we should be ready to acknowledge his hand in the great events of life, if need be, before the whole world.

Our "Answered Prayer" mail has been steadily increasing in volume lately, and the past week has been quite phenomenal. It would almost seem that a great tide of gratitude for God's goodness has been rising in many hearts, and that its expression is finding an outlet in these earnest letters to the Prayer League. They deal with a wide variety of requests, covering many phases of human need. Of the large number of cases dealt with, we can outline only a few:

W. E. F., a business man of Baltic, Ohio, who writes to ask the League's prayers for the recovery of a brother seriously ill of typhoid fever, concludes his letter with the following paragraph: "I can also testify to answered prayer in the past."

From Mobile, Ala., L. D. F. writes: "I write to thank God for answered prayer for my daughter, who was suffering from nervous prostration and mental trouble. The Prayer League is a great comfort to me."

There is a note of real joy in this, from Mrs. H. A., Tennessee: "I requested the prayers of the League that my son might be saved. I am happy to say he has been converted. Praise God!"

A husband and wife in Turlock, Calif., bear this united testimony: "We take great pleasure in being members of the Prayer League, praying and being prayed for at the noon hour, and have been wonderfully blessed, both temporally and spiritually."

A "Praying Mother" in Fort Worth, Texas, gives this testimony: "I wish to acknowledge an answer to several prayers. I know God will answer, if we only trust him."

Another mother gives thanks for answered prayer in behalf of her daughter's health, and asks the League to pray for the safety of this daughter on a journey she must soon take. And the next is content to exclaim, "I wish to say that God has answered my prayers this winter in a wonderful way, and many times before." Another, who signs herself "A strong believer in prayer," relates how her grandmother's faith had been renewed in answer to the prayers of the League. And another exclaims: "My heart is grateful to God for answered prayers at various times."

This is the story of a broken promise. A lady in Detroit, Mich., writes: "Many years ago I was in great anxiety, and I asked God to help me, and promised that I would acknowledge it if he did so. He answered my prayer, but I did not keep my promise. It has troubled me many times. Now I wish to do it before all men."

E. L. K., Garnerville, N. Y., writes: "It is nearly a year since I wrote asking your prayers for a sick daughter. Today I write to let you know that our prayers are being answered, as she is slowly but surely recovering."

Mrs. C. L. H., Lander, Wyo., writes: "A few weeks ago I wrote asking the League to pray that my son's mind might be restored. We wish to thank the League for their petition, and we devoutly thank our Heavenly Father that our son is all right again."

How many mothers all over America are praying for absent and erring sons? "I wish to acknowledge," writes Mrs. E. J, of Seattle, "that my son, for whom I asked prayers, has secured permanent employment, and that his faith in God is more steadfast than ever. I give God all the glory."

M. C. C., Chicago, Ill., gives grateful thanks to God for the cure of a friend of the liquor habit, in response to prayer; a mother in Elizabethville, Pa., praises God for many answered prayers in her lifetime; a Friend in Columbus, Wis., has also to acknowledge that many prayers have been wonderfully answered; a similar grateful declaration comes from E. H., Newport News, Va.; and J. S., Bigelow, Kan., gives thanks to God for healing him of blood poisoning through prayer.

Mrs. J. E. M. writes from Oxford, Mass.: "Some time ago I wrote you asking you to pray for the conversion of a friend, and that he might also be influenced not to do any business on Sunday. About two weeks ago he received a shock paralyzing one side. His arm is helpless, and he can only move his leg a little. The doctor thinks he can never walk again. I would like to ask you to pray earnestly for his recovery."

PRAYERS are asked for revivals of religion at: Butler, Ind.; Lohrville, Iowa; Nashville, Tenn.; Hurdsfield, N. D.; Augusta, Va.; Raleigh, N. C.; Goshen, Va.; Arlington, N. J.; Kearney, N. J.; Martin, Mich.; Vaiden, Miss.; Ness City, Kan.; Grand Rapids, Mich. (pray earnestly for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit individually upon the crowds of people in Detroit, Mich., who throng to the meetings of Mr. Sunday, now in that city); Mulberry Grove, Ill. (for the success of a revival in Mount Zion Baptist Church); Ludlow, Vt. (for the success of a revival in the Methodist Church); Pittsfield, Me. (that many may be saved during revival); Winsted, Conn. (that the saloons may be voted out of the town); Parkers, Pa. (that town may go dry); Charlotte, N. C. (for blessings upon a religious meeting of all denominations, that the entire community may receive a blessing); North Lawrence, N. Y. (for success of a revival in the Baptist Church).

Mrs. A. asks prayer that a way may be opened for husband to enter the ministry.

Four parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; five friends ask prayer that minds may be strengthened; M. S. asks prayer that father's mind may be restored; thirteen friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives or friends.

Six friends ask prayer that their sight may be strengthened; Mrs. I. H., that mother's sight may be restored; four other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends or relatives.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Twelve parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; seven wives, their husbands; J. E. N. asks prayer that a physician may be delivered from the liquor habit; seven, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

A reader asks prayer that brother may be cured of the drug habit.

An aged mother asks prayer that seven sons may be saved; Mrs. M. E. asks prayer that four sons may be saved; twenty-seven other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; ten wives, their husbands; fifty-seven for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Eleven readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others.

Ninety-seven ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including M. P., that mother may be healed and regain the use of limbs; sixty-one friends, for healing for themselves. Thirteen friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Twenty-nine ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Sixty friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answered prayer have been received from the following: I. E. A., Senvia, Ga.; Mrs. J. B., Edon, Ohio; A. M., Cincinnati, Ohio; S. E., Harrisville, W. Va.; A Reader, Santa Barbara, Calif.; J. W. T., Stratford, Conn.; A. J. M., Belmont, N. Y.; Mrs. F. A. C., Norwich, Conn ; Mrs. E. A. N., Warren, Pa.; E. L., Middleboro, Mass.; J. S. AFTER NOVEMBER 10, 1916
HRISTIAN HERALD WILL BE $2.00

The increase in the cost of paper, printing ink, labor, and in fact of practically everything that goes to make up the Christian Herald, will compel us to increase the subscription price to $2.00 a year. This increase will not be effective until November 10, 1916, so that subscribers have an opportunity until that time of renewing for another year at the present price of $1.50.

NOTHING in the home is quite so suggestive of individual effort as a piece of hand-made lace. The distinctive design, the countless interweaving stitches, the artistic little irregularities here and there—all spell the tedious, painstaking handwork that no one can mistake.

Exquisite pieces of this kind are so full of the human spirit that we instinctively respect, love and care for them as we would a friend. Only the method of cleaning which we consider good enough for tender skins is good enough for them. Only the mild, pure, neutral soap that makes the bath and toilet a delight is worthy of washing their hand-drawn threads.

Episcopalians for Peace and Justice

T is becoming increasingly evident that the churches of the world are beginning to realize the opportunity which is theirs, in a world torn from its foundations by a cataclysm of strife, to build aew structure of love and of world-wide service upon fdations which in the past have been somewhat degarded. The common man and woman whose ds were grimed with the world's toil, and whose n was forfeit in its strife, have been too much negked, and churches have raised their voices in a nch too narrow and provincial spirit in support of kgs, crowned and uncrowned, whose per or pleasure they enjoyed or feared. w the churches are wakening to their ronsibility to God and their duty to nkind. They are taking a wider w, a more Christlike view of life and oservice, and they are moving toward anited effort to build upon the ruin of w a peace that shall be lasting because its just, and a church that is powerful hause it is purged of class or faction, ted in prayer and effort in the service one Lord, Christ Jesus.

HE Protestant Episcopal Church in America has, throughout the history of the nation, stood before tho genel public very much in the light of t society church. It has numbered t rich among its communicants to h a degree that, in the eyes of many, i ministry to those whose labor makes vlth possible has been little seen. It ws therefore with much astonishment, al possibly with a feeling of terror in ne conservative circles, that there was ed in the proceedings of the Fortyth General Convention of the Protestt Episcopal Church, which met on ober 11 in St. Louis, a considerable tnd toward socialism. Meetings under t direction of the Social Service Comsion of the church, which were adcssed by fifteen of the newer bishops, eloped many advanced economic ws, some of them extremely socialic.

n the third day of the convention, t Rev. Dr. J. Howard Melish of boklyn, an avowed Christian Sociali in a speech delivered during the noon iermission, declared that the worker s conspicuously absent from the Episal fold, and that the church could rain him only by understanding him. Iultitudes," he said, "come to this ntry believing it to be a land flowing h milk and honey, and find that the k is skimmed and that others have n off with the honey. The church has g emphasized the seed, but she has fgotten the soil. Nothing is to be gned by the church's telling the work- to be honest, avoid violence and be iperate. . . . Our competitive syst is morally and socially bankrupt. is stony ground, full of thorns and tstles. The workers know it and ask for a soil where t seed of real human and social life may bring forth andant fruit. . . . The church now recognizes the h as the class by which its missions and philanthros are conducted. In the same way, why should it recognize the wage-earners as the instrumentality der God by which the new economic era is to come? ey come with new truths, new spiritualities, new as. . . . The church should recognize the new rit and rejoice in it and do its part to be obedient the principles and purposes of Christ."

The Rev. Dr. George Israel Brown of Harrisburg, ., speaking on the same day, offered a resolution in House of Deputies, declaring that the present onomic system makes for the poverty of the masses. asked that the Social Service Commission bo emwered to ask the government of the United States to ke a scientific test of the principles of Christian operation. Bishop-elect Irving P. Johnson said at "the wealth of the Protestant Episcopal Church s not consecrated," and that "the poor gave to the h eternal life."

Showing a tendency along the same lines, Bishop Charles C. A. Hall of Vermont, after listening to an appeal by the Rev. Dr. Arthur Selden Lloyd, president of the Board of Missions, in which he pleaded for lives devoted to poverty and sacrifice, moved that the salary attached to the office which Dr. Lloyd holds should be materially reduced at the end of the term of the present occupant. Bishop Hall said: "It hardly seems compatible with a plea for men to accept hard places with small stipends, when the president of the Board of Missions receives $9,500 a year."

An event within an event: St. Paul's, New York, celebrates its 150th anniversary. The historic edifice faces west, its rear to Broadway. (See close of convention story)

THE report of Bishop Lloyd showed that in the three years since the last convention Episcopalians have given through the Board of Missions $4,600,000. The appropriations for the last year were $1,500,000, which were paid in full, with a surplus of $131,000. The church is now supporting 400 foreign missionaries, 1100 native workers, and 1100 missionaries in the United States.

The convention was still in session when this article was written. There was still to come ten days of earnest work. An effort was made on the 13th and 14th to pass a new canon on the subject of divorce, by which the clergy would be forbidden to solemnize the marriage of a person who had been married and divorced, if the other party to the divorce were still living. It was charged that there was today so much collusion in the securing of divorces that it was impossible to be certain of the identity of the innocent party, whom the priests of the church aro now authorized to remarry. The proposed canon was dofeated by a close vote of three and three-quarters lay votes. The clerical delegates gave a majority for the measure. A proposal for changing the marriage service by which the obligations of both man and woman become identical, and which would omit the woman's promise to obey and the man's declaration that "with my worldly goods I thee endow," was not acted upon by this General Convention. The whole subject of matters related to matrimony was put over to the convention of 1919, this convention preferring to give its attention to the revision and enrichment of the prayer book, a subject which has been under consideration since 1871, when it was discovered, on the occasion of the Chicago fire during a meeting of the General Convention, that there was no fitting prayer for the occasion, and the convention united in the litany as being the nearest approach to a prayer for the sufferers of Chicago. The bishops have recommended the preparation of an Italian prayer book because of the large number of Italians who have become affiliated with the Episcopal Church. A new hymnal has been adopted which will contain many new hymns, and from which many old ones will be omitted because, it is charged, they are not in harmony with the spirit of the age.

A RADICAL proposal, submitted to the convention by Robert H. Gardiner of Maine, was designed to make women eligible as deputies. He said: "The restriction of the representation of the laity to men is merely a survival of the habit formed when woman was a chattel. . . . We men always have expected of women higher standards of duty than of ourselves. Why should we not givo her equal responsibility and privilege?"

The question of the revision of the Ten Commandments, eliminating explanatory matter and making each a simple statement, was carried over to the next General Convention. The proposal for the election of negro bishops and the creation of separate negro dioceses in the South had not, at this writing, come up for decision, but it is one of the questions which the convention will discuss before its close.

It was expected in some quarters that the difference of opinion in the Board of Missions over the question of sending delegates to the missionary conference at Panama would develop definite lines of cleavago in the convention itself. The convention proved, however, to be filled with a Pentecostal zeal for missions which banished the difference between high, low and broad church factions, and brushed aside the question of the Panama incident.

Rev. William Lawrence, Bishop of Massachusetts, who first proposed the raising of the $5,000,000 fund for the pensioning of superannuated clergymen, reported that more than two-thirds of the $5,000,000 fund had already been raised, and it was expected that the balance would be secured within the time set, which was March 1, 1917. Under the plan, each parish will pay into the fund seven and one-half per cent. of the salary of the clergy, and each retired clergyman will receive $600 a year. A commission of the church is investigating the business methods of the various parishes, and is planning for a standardizing of the bookkeeping and finance, so that there will be a definite system of ecclesiastical accounting throughout the church. The report of the commission says: "We are bound to say that we had no conception of the number of cases of dishonesty and of almost criminal carelessness. It is clear that the reason for our ignorance is found in the natural but wrong desire to protect the church from the injury from the scandal resulting in the froquent hushing up of such troubles."

BISHOP DANIEL S. TUTTLE of Missouri, the senior bishop of the church, in the opening sermon of the convention urged upon the church that it develop a distinctly American religion. Acknowledging the debt of Episcopalianism to the mother church in England, he declared that the church had passed the adolescent years and was now housekeeping in a home of its own. He declared that "we want to have an American flavor in our church. Then in that good time when an approaching unity seems somewhat to materialize, we want to offer to our fellow Christians of other names around about us an American religion with an American flavor as our contribution." The bishop, in proving that Episcopalianism is essentially American, declared: "We are united. We have no North, no South, no East, no West. There is no cleavage of separation on sectional lines, of latitude or longitude, or for differences of race, or color, or class, or taste. Is not that American?" He declared that he got enthusiastic as he compared the church of today with the church of fifty years ago, when fifty-one bishops guided the spiritual affairs of 150,000 communicants, whereas today 120 bishops represent 1,000,000 communicants.

The Right Rev. Paul Jones, Missionary Bishop of Utah, addressing a woman's mass meeting in connection with the convention, said: "We are not trying to convert individual Mormons, but we are trying to convert Mormonism. It sounds like an impossible task, but the prospect is hopeful. During the last fifty years great changes have taken place in Mormon doctrines and practice, and we feel sure the church has contributed to this result. Polygamy has practically been abandoned and blood atonement is heard of no more. Excellent Sunday schools have been established, the Bible is used more frequently, and the remaining peculiarities of Mormonism seem to be disappearing."

THE sessions of October 17 were notable for the position which both the House of Bishops and the House of Delegates took upon the question of world peace, which they recognized as the great crisis confronting Christendom. The resolution adopted by the House of Bishops, after setting forth the present conditions in the world, calls for "a clearer recognition of the Christian principles of the brotherhood of man; the practice of righteousness and good-will between nations as between individuals; the substitution of judicial process for war in the settlement of international policies, and laws not merely as an abstract ideal, but as a practical conviction for whose development the Christian churches have special responsibilities." It was proposed that this General Convention provide for a commission to consist of ten bishops chosen by the House of Bishops and ten presbyters and ten lay communicants selected by the Deputies. It would be the duty of this commission, in the words of the resolution, "to promote the spread of the desire for peace in the world and international friendship throughout the churches." This proposition followed closely the suggestion made in an earlier session of the convention by Bishop Montgomery of the Anglican Church. According to this suggestion both men and women were to be sent to England to confer with the Church of England as to the present world crisis. Under the canon law of the Episcopal Church, as it stands, it is considered doubtful if women delegates could be elected; but the wording of the resolution is held to make possible the probable selection of some of the leaders among the women of the church among the ten lay communicants. The growing influence of women in the church was evidenced during the session of October 17, when an attempt to shelve the Gardiner resolution authorizing the election of women delegates to the House of Deputies failed, and the resolution was held upon the calendar of the convention.

Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle

The sessions of the convention of October 18 and 19 were notable for the discussions that preceded he adoption of the proposed new prayers for the va us elements of government. The prayer for state l islatures and the one for courts and magistrates re accepted with little opposition. It was sugge ed that the prayer offered by Washington when he armies of the Revolution were disbanded shoul be adopted as a prayer for the country.

The proposed prayers for the army and navy re adopted only after momentous discussion in whicl he advocates of peace registered both a protest ai a prophecy. The proposed prayer for the army ks the "God of Hosts" to stretch forth his Almighty m "to strengthen and protect the soldiers of our c n-try, to support them in the day of battle, and in ne of peace to keep them safe from all evil," and c es with the petition that "they may serve withou e-proach as having before them the vision of the en Lord." Dr. John Howard Melish, as spokesma of the opponents of the prayer, declared, according tc he press, that its adoption would be an irreparable in ry to the youth of the nation. He said he opposec he prayer on two grounds; first, that it had no vi n, and second that it was without sense because it a ed for things that could not possibly be granted. He id it was impossible for soldiers to serve without repr ch and that we were asking God to grant somethin n-tirely without meaning, for war cannot be waged h-out reproach. He opposed it also because it was h-out Christianity, in that it prayed to the Go of Hosts, the ancient Israelitish ideal, instead of tc he Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Prince of P e. Dr. Melish proposed the following prayer for he army:

> "O God, who hast taught us to love our enemies and do good unto them that hate us, bless our soldiers and sailo for their swift obedience and their willingness to answer the c of duty, but inspire them none the less with a hatred of wa nd may they never for love of private glory or advance nt provoke its coming. May our young men still rejoice lie for their country with the valor of their fathers, but teac ur age nobler methods of matching our strengh and more eff ve ways of giving our life for the flag."

When put to a vote, however, the prayer prop ed by the Revision Committee was carried. A pr er for social justice was proposed by Rev. George I el

As to Woman Suffrage in 1917

[LAST week the Christian Herald published the views and plans of leaders in the movement to obtain the ballot for women, and promised the other side of the question for this week.]

The Other Side of the Question

AN INTERVIEW WITH MRS. ARTHUR M. DODGE,
President National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage

"I HAVE been asked," said one woman to another, "to join our local anti-suffrage society. Do you know anything about it?"

"I am ashamed to admit that I don't," said her friend. "But," she vaguely asked, "isn't such an organization opposed to progress?"

That the opposition to woman suffrage is an opposition to woman's progress was emphatically denied by Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge, president of the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, in her pleasant New York office recently. "A woman should go in for everything progressive. It is because we believe that woman suffrage is not progressive that we are against it. It is decidedly retrogressive. People are realizing more and more that the charitable and educational work of the world should be kept separate and distinct from politics. Our school boards, hospitals, prisons—all manner of civic and reformatory work, in short—are more efficient when administered entirely apart from party politics. Progress for women ends at the ballot box."

The work planned for this fall by the anti-suffragists is to be carried on upon educational lines. The antis do not believe in street speaking, parades or pageants. Girls accosting voters at the polling places and speaking on street corners lost the suffragists many votes last fall, they say. The anti-suffragists believe that by working quietly along educational lines they can do more efficient work than when a more spectacular campaign is attempted. The plans for the winter's work, however, include an anti-suffrage convention to be held in Washington, as well as large district meetings in New England, the Middle West and the South. The South, which is decidedly not in favor of votes for women, is just beginning to realize that it must do something definite.

The convention is to last two days, and will be addressed by many famous speakers. There will be special trains from several important cities, and many of the states will send delegates.

"We want to hold the convention in Washington," said Mrs. Dodge, "so that Congress may see our strength and our purpose. We do not interfere in politics, but we wish to have the nation realize that we have a large organization."

The announcements of the big convention summarize the ideals of the antis:

"This will be the first national convention ever held in America by women who believe that progress for their sex lies outside of politics, and demand their exemption from voting duty and masculine activities that they may consecrate themselves more fully to higher missions of womanhood.

© Gerhard Sisters
Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge

"The National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage is now five years old. Hitherto, only regular annual meetings for the reading of reports, election of officers and other regular business connected with the opposition to woman suffrage have been held.

"This year, however, the antis are arranging to make a big popular demonstration of the constructive as well as the obstructive philosophy of their movement. The ideal of the anti-suffragists is the ultimate union of women of all classes and creeds along non-partisan lines, so that the interests of womanhood, childhood and civilization may be advanced free from the strife and division of politics, factions and parties; and that the fundamental principles of patriotism, morality and Americanism upon which all good citizens are agreed may be established more firmly in the present and future generations.

"The immediate object of the association is the defeat of woman suffrage, which, with its feminist teachings and socialistic tendencies, the anti-suffragists consider inimical to the true interests of womanhood; but this object will not be emphasized at the convention.

"The convention will not be devoted to anti-suffrage propaganda. The speakers have been asked to bring out constructive and practical ideas of democracy, citizenship, patriotism and preparedness, with special regard to the aspirations and achievements of woman.

"President Wilson has been asked to address the convention on the subject of states' rights and local self-government."

TWENTY-five state associations opposed to woman suffrage unite to form the National, and there is also a National Anti-Suffrage Association whose membership is made up of men. The former organization has an enrolment of more than 350,000 women over twenty-one years of age, the majority of whom have enrolled during the last two y rs. From registrations of wome in certain districts it is estim ed that over 10,000,000 Ame an women are opposed to suffrag or their sex, and that the maj ty of the remainder are not as ng for the vote and would not use it if it were fo ed upon them.

Mrs. Dodge, in referring to the convention, d: "We hope to bring out clearly, on this occasion, ur opposition to the Federal amendment. The r-whelming vote recorded against woman suffrage r-ing the last three years in Wisconsin, Michigan, o, Missouri, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, w York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania d Iowa proves conclusively that woman suffrage is ot desired by the majority of the people of our na n. Hopelessly defeated in their state referenda campa ns, the suffragists, in their extremity, have turned tc he Federal amendment as a last hope. By means it they are endeavoring, as the Woman's Political U on declared last winter, to 'force' woman suffrage on states which have rejected the measure. This a repudiation of the principles of government on which our republic is founded.

"However, the men who cast their votes ag st woman suffrage merely registered public opinio on the subject—and this public opinion was largel n-fluenced by women. Our argument against the b ot for our sex is the fact that most women do not wan he vote. This is proved conclusively by the comp a-tively small number of women who have enrolle as suffragists after more than sixty years of suffrage gi-tation. It is also proved by the refusal of suff ge leaders to endorse a referendum of this question to o-men themselves. It is obviously unjust for a min ty of women to force the majority into politics ag st the wishes of the same majority.

"When the suffragists think of some way in whic to lessen a woman's burdens, we shall be glad to liste to them. Women have enough burdens to bear t y without the added weight of politics.

"We are quoted as saying, 'Woman's place is in e home.' This only inadequately expresses our poi of view. I think the best place for a woman is the h e. But to make that home successful, a woman mus e broad-minded and in touch with the life of the n-munity. She must be conversant with all that i r-ests her husband and her children. The day of e old-fashioned woman, who cares for nothing t housekeeping, is past. Home-making implies not ly housekeeping, but all that pertains to the buildin of a social center. In its broadest sense, the home is e great social center of community life.

"Not long ago," concluded Mrs. Dodge, "Dr. A a Shaw and I met and had a talk. It was a very i r-esting talk, but we could agree on only one thi — that the people of America need more religion. et that be my message to the readers of the Chris n Herald."

The Wicked John Goode

An Autobiography of Real Life,
by HORACE WINTHROP SCANDLIN

It was cold and sharp with wind, and the snow unched crisply under foot, as host and guest tered the grounds of a modest and comfortabl ountry home. The log fire in the cozy living-roo burned cheerfully and cast a soft, mellow light hal ay into the room as the two men dropped into the uge leather chairs invitingly placed before it. Th awaited the call to dinner. Weary and footsor hey were after a five-mile jaunt from the club whe they had spent the morning.

th keen appetites the two men partook of a roa and its fixings in silence. Each seemed absor d with his own reflections. Reaction after the wa perhaps. Or was it the season? It was the las day of the year. Was it the year they were abt to leave behind, the years they had left behir, or the year they were about to enter of which the two men were thinking? At any rate, their sil ce remained unbroken. They seemed to unde and, these two men. The silence seemed as sat fying as the meal.

ffee and cheese were served at a small table in fro of the fireplace amid the still unbroken siler. And, as if to hold unbroken their reverie, th settled deep down in their chairs.

e guest was massive—a giant of New England ori n developed into rugged manhood by a str uous early life in the Far and Middle We . Close cropped hair—gray—and deep fac l lines seemed to indicate his age, but th huge frame and the steel-like muscles of e big limbs gave a different impression. Th high and heavy forehead and the overha ging brow bespoke intellect. The keen, st -blue eyes spelled determination. Yet th e eyes had a soft, kindly look, one that in ed confidence. It was a look not at all lik what one would associate with the rest of e portrait. A square, protruding chin co pleted the picture of a man who could an would indulge, and who had indulged, hi very desire.

e guest drew from his pocket a package of apers and extracted a typewritten letter, wh h he had read and reread many times.

hat's an invitation to speak at a men's cl," he said quietly, as though continuing al d a mental conversation. "I've done a pi of thinking ever since it came. Last ni t Dr. Hallimond asked me to be sure and ac pt it. Of course I'll do anything he asks.

s I look back sometimes—like today for inst ce—it seems as though I must be dreaming or though Aladdin had crossed my path. Just th k of all the friends I've got. Just think what y ve all meant to me and who you all are—busin s men, doctors, lawyers, ministers, editors, sc es of you; and look at me!

'm a porter, ten hours a day, eleven dollars a w k, fifty-two years old and—" The sentence rem ned unfinished.

hesitated about replying, for I knew well the m and his manners. If I spoke the wrong reply I uld divert the trend of his thoughts. So I kept si t, knowing instinctively I was to hear again as re arkable a story as was ever told—a story of absol truth, and one that would do both teller and h er much good.

nd then he began and told me for the second ti e this tale.

CHAPTER I

My Start

I WAS two years old when my parents took me from Massachusetts to a silver camp, the town of Caribou in the northern part of the state of Colorado. She—my mother—was a good w an. My father was a fighting, whisky-drinking h man, as irritable when sober as he was cruel and v ous when drunk. I don't remember ever having se him sober! He was a bad actor and had left C ada some years earlier just in time to escape the n se in a good stout rope. The town was sixty m s from the nearest railroad, and the only Bible it ontained was my mother's. My mother also had t distinction of being the only white woman in t camp.

efore long other children were born to my parents, a as my mother's duties were many besides caring f her children I need not tell you that my early t ning was a totally minus quantity. My parents k t a boarding-house for miners, and you can easily i gine the environment I found myself in and h much attention my mother could give to us. T ere simply was no discipline. I grew up— t t's all.

n those days a mining camp was no fit place f children. All that these camps knew was r gh work, rough people, rough times. Everything w hard.

'll never forget how in two winters two of my younger brothers and one sister died. The men, my father and a friend, built tiny coffins out of pine soapboxes which I fetched from the store. In these crude, rough, unlined affairs they placed the little bodies and then nailed on the lids. In each instance the death occurred in winter, and the frost was deep in the ground. Before the graves could be opened huge fires were built on the selected spots. We waited, my mother, father and me, with a few friends till the ground thawed out. No stone or wood marked these graves. No enclosure protected the little bodies. Soon even the little mounds had disappeared, and not long after that the incidents themselves were forgotten, for it was work, work, work of the hardest sort, with no time or place for sentiment or sorrow.

John Goode

Nor was there time or place for discipline. When we were well we kept out of the way. When we were sick we were a trouble, but in the crude manner of the day and place we were cared for and restored to health—or we died. Had there been time for discipline it would have had no effect on me. My father blocked all efforts at anything but work. The only time he noticed me was when I crossed him in some childish way, and then he beat me unmercifully. I soon learned that it was safest to keep out of his way, and thus it was that I also learned to know what "father" meant. My hatred of him grew apace while my love for my mother—if I knew then what love meant—deepened. I remember her as a meek, quiet, sorrowful woman—a woman of few words. She always shielded me as best she could from my father, and covered up my misdeeds. The beatings he gave me hurt her as much as they hurt me. I can vividly remember her pleading with him to be merciful as he brought a stick down on my bare back, blow after blow. Sometimes, after she had lied to save me, a neighbor would tell him; and then I would pay dearly for my wrong and for my mother's intended kindness.

By the time I was seven I had learned well the need of keeping out of my father's sight, and I had learned still better how to take care of myself. I had done my first stealing before I was five years old. I had helped myself to money from the cash draw of the only store in camp. Why shouldn't I? I didn't know it was wrong. All I knew was that I couldn't get candy at home. There all the money went for whisky. No one saw me steal the first time or the second time, so no one scolded me. No one beat me for stealing, so it couldn't be wrong, my child mind reasoned.

At ten I was incorrigible! I had felt my own power. I had experienced every sensation, good and bad, the town was able to supply. Caribou had become too small, and my father too cruel. I had never been to school, for there was no school to go to. And so I reached the age of eleven—a liar, a gambler and a thief!

WITH that year came the most brutal beating a boy ever received. It developed into a fight—father and son. I was well put up and well versed with my hands, and he was beastly drunk and mad. With that beating came an instant determination to run away. Never for an instant would I regret leaving home—my brothers and sisters—my father and mother. What were they to me? Had I not shifted for myself all my life? I could continue to do so.

I walked the sixty miles to the railroad, to the then little wooden city of saloons, gambling houses and dens of ill-repute called Denver. It was fed then by but one railroad, the old Kansas Pacific, now the Union Pacific.

I remember the thrills as they chased themselves up and down my spine when from a mountain top, afar off, I caught my first glimpse of the city.

It was a walk I'll never forget. Bears and Indians and wolves were plentiful, and it was a trip that would test the nerves of the bravest boy. The long, long daylight hours and the dreadful, fearful thought of those surely coming nights with their inky, inky blackness . . . But little did I realize that the blackness of those black nights on that runaway journey were as broad daylight compared to the blackness of the life I was slowly but surely walking into.

I was on the road four days and three nights. I slept on the ground two nights and in a deserted mining shack the other. I can distinctly remember the howling of the wolves and how lonely and frightened I was. But not once was I tempted to return to my father. He had taught me too well his lessons. All during the trip I had been fearful lest he should seek me, knowing, of course, that Denver was the only place to which I could head.

I wonder if he made any effort to find me? I wonder what my mother thought and how she felt? Never once since I passed through the camp on my way to the railroad have I seen my father nor even heard of him. He must have long since passed over the Great Divide, for his manner of living fifty years ago could only have meant an early end. I have seen my mother only twice since, and she too, no doubt, has passed to her reward. All that I ever knew of her life was hard, cruelly hard. No woman could stand it long.

CHAPTER II

An Eleven-Year-Old Runaway

ON leaving the mountains and dropping into the valley which holds the city of Denver, I proceeded slowly, walking twice around the town before entering or speaking to any one. After I had sized up the place, I singled out what looked to be a boarding house and applied for a job. My surmise proved to be correct, and I was set to work at once washing dishes. I didn't like the place nor the work, which was the first I'd ever done, and so after three days I beat it. As nothing had been said about wages none were due me.

I went to the railroad yard and picked up an acquaintance with an engineer, who took my cock-and-bull story in whole. He was a good man, and readily consented to my riding in the caboose of his freight leaving that day for Kansas City. My reception on the train of fifty odd freight cars and one caboose was cordial. My age, of course, was responsible for that.

"Where yer going, son?"

"Where yer been?"

"Yer hungry?"

The ice was broken. They took me in and shared their grub and bunks with me. Here I again experienced what I now know to be kindness. It made me feel queer. Here were all these rough-looking, dirty men—and no one hit me—no one was drunk. They told me stories of railroading as it was done in those days, of holdups, of wrecks, and my blood fairly raced through my system, propelled by the beats of a little eleven-year-old runaway heart.

I'm not telling you this for sympathy, God knows I'm not! I'm telling it to you so that the next time you are told of a man who is a criminal and who will never be anything else, remember my story and the inherent good there was in me and is in every other human being; how that little bit of goodness was kindled into flame; how that little flame was nursed until it could keep aglow alone. Remember my start in life; perhaps the other fellow's start was like mine. I was as yellow a cur as ever lived—a man couldn't be more yellow—and yet I had what every mortal has—an inherent grain of goodness that's God-given, and which no man has the right to deny.

In four days the train pulled onto a siding in the freight yards at Kansas City.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

JUST ANOTHER NOTE. The reply of the British and French governments to the American note of May 24, protesting against the seizure of and interference with American mails, was received in Washington on October 12 and was made public October 14. The note leaves the controversy practically where it was before. It is given up largely to an argument in justification of the action of the Allies in detaining mails of a neutral character to search for material or information which might be of value to the enemy. A great deal is made of the fact that the American note admitted partial justification of the action of the Allies. The only thing gained by the exchange of notes is a repetition of the promise already made for the expediting of the work of the censors, and a declaration that the governments of France and Great Britain are ready, as they have always been, to settle responsibility for any abuse, errors or derelictions committed under their authority according to the principles of law and justice, "which it never was and is not now their intention to evade." There has been no hint from Washington as to what reply might be made, or as to what further steps might be taken to uphold the rights of American commerce, in defense of which our note of May 24 said, "Only a radical change, restoring to the United States its full rights as a neutral power, will satisfy this government."

AMERICAN NAVY PATROLS THE SEA. Following the activities of the German submarine U-53 off Nantucket, the American torpedo destroyer squadron was kept at sea cleared for action, patrolling the entire New England coast supposedly in a search for a possible submarine supply ship, or for a hidden base of supply which might have served a belligerent. On October 15 an explosion at East Machias, Maine, destroyed a fisherman's hut in a little-frequented inlet. The owner of the building declared his entire ignorance as to the source of the explosives which were destroyed, and the possible location of the as yet mythical U-boat base in American waters is still a matter of conjecture, although at this writing the swift destroyers were still conducting their patrol.

MILK WAR ENDED. With the surrender of the Borden Company on October 14 the conflict between the producers and distributing companies in New York ended. The distributers accepted the farmers' terms, and the settlement provides for a committee of five which will decide the monthly price at which business is to be done after January 1. Both sides found the two weeks' struggle so expensive that neither wishes a repetition of it. The loss to the farmers is estimated at $505,080 through the failure to ship 10,980,000 quarts of milk, and the loss to the distributers is estimated at $1,043,100 which they would have cleared in the handling of this same milk. The loss to the public may be expected to follow the settlement, as they must pay the higher price which is said to be inevitable.

AFTER VILLA AGAIN. Negotiations of the American-Mexican Peace Commission having developed that the withdrawal of the Pershing expedition is entirely contingent upon the elimination of Villa's influence in northern Mexico, it was announced from official Mexican sources on October 16 that a campaign for the capture of Villa and for the destruction of his power was already under way, and would be pushed to a conclusion. Carranza forces were said to be closing in on the Villistas from three sides. In the meantime, President Wilson has assured Governor Whitman of New York that there is still need for the Guard on the border, and reports persist that Felix Diaz is gaining power and extending the territory under his control.

The Tank, the latest evolution in war engines

NECESSITY, the mother of invention in warfare as elsewhere, has not failed to produce some monstrosities in enginery whenever great wars have entered a stage of deadlock, and the present war has not been without the aid of invention, both on the battlefield and in the columns of the press. At present a British armored automobile which carries its track with it, the Tank, is performing remarkable exploits on land and paper. This portable fort, about forty feet long and twelve feet high, is supplied with powerful wheels that revolve wide studded belts over rollers, these belts serving as tires that grip the ground and as tracks upon which the car advances. (The two wheels seen in front may or may not belong to this instrument, it is not clear.) The Tank carries machine guns mounted in turrets (see left side of car), and these can fire between 500 and 800 shots a minute each; besides, the crew of five men use rifles, firing through slits in the armor.

This remarkable engine of destruction, moving with deliberation at four miles an hour, has, according to the press, performed remarkable feats. It has caused the enemy to fall on its knees begging for mercy; it has sauntered into trenches in the midst of chaos and neatly annihilated the Germans; it has driven mad with terror whole companies of Huns (short for the old-time designation, "Our German cousins"); it has stepped daintily across running streams and old trenches; it has in the darkness or in a moment of inattention by the steersman dipped into an unexpected excavation only to mount the opposite side like a stolid tortoise and speed onward; it has looked with reproving eyes upon a factory that stood in its path, and, the factory not budging, it has reluctantly moved right through the building which crumbled behind it, the unfortunate work people never knowing what struck them; it has found it inconvenient to go around a piece of woods and so amazed peasants afterwards have wondered at gigantic pathways through the forests paved by fallen trees and crushed branches.

But it would be quite impossible to narrate all the adventures of the traveling fort. Those mentioned and others have been chronicled in the press, where also we read that one Tank on the Somme front got out of control and was moving directly into the power of the enemy, to prevent which, lest the secret of its mechanism be discovered, British gunners shelled the car with its crew of British soldiers into annihilation. The chronicler of this horrid tale admits that "it was a sad thing to have to do," and states as a climax that the machine cost $15,000! We repeat all these stories without vouching for their accuracy. If we were going to produce a new book of fairy tales, we would be disposed to invite some war correspondents to undertake the preparation of the manuscript. The British Tanks appear to be nothing more nor less than powerfully armored tractors equipped with a remarkable device for providing their own track across uneven ground. If that is what they are, they can undoubtedly make a notable contribution to the slaughter now going on in Europe, without climbing trees or breaking into buildings.

SLAMMING THE DOOR. Telegraphic dispatches from Peking on October 14 indicated that Japan and Russia had entered protests against two concessions to Americans. A protest was lodged against the contract with the American International Corporation for the building of a railroad from Fengcheng to Lanchoyfu, a distance of 400 miles, the Russian government feeling that this railroad, since it approached closely Russia's sphere of influence in Mongolia, transgressed an oral agreement entered into eighteen years ago, giving to Russia the exclusive privilege of building railways in the vincinity of Mongolia. It was said that in case the Russian protest squashed the American concession the American company would be empowered to construct an equal mileage elsewhere. Japan was reported to have protested against the reconstruction of the Grand Canal in China by ner cans. Japan claims that, havir co quered the German concession at ha tung, she has thereby succeeded o a German concessions, among whi wa originally included the reconstruc on this canal system. China is repo ed t have replied that Germany is r ye defeated, and that the Japanese cces sion is therefore not established.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE fighting in the Picardy sector of the western front for the past week has been very violent. On Saturday, October 14, the British and French began a joint strong attack on the whole German position on the front north of the Somme from just north of Courcelette to as far south as the Pierre Vaast wood, northeast of Rancourt, throwing in fresh reserves in a stubborn effort to pierce the lines of the enemy.

The center of the battle, which was as severe as any fighting which has heretofore taken place in the war, was to the west of Sailly Saillisel, between that place and Morval. On this front the French delivered no less than seven assaults one after the other, wherein at times the combatants came to a hand-to-hand struggle. But the German lines held fast, and in spite of the desperate gallantry of their attacks the French were ultimately repulsed without the slightest gain.

North of Sailly-Saillisel a ferocious battle took place between the British and Germans, in the eastern section of Gueudecourt, which raged hotly for hours, but its conclusion found the combatants' positions unchanged. This is the first time since the offensive of the Allies in this Picardy sector began that the Germans have successfully withstood so general, so sustained and so determined an assault by the Allies without giving ground.

Constantine, king of Greece

The hottest fighting south of the Somme was for the possession of the little village of Ablaincourt, between Fresnes and Gressoire. In the end, the Germans held the town and took a couple of hundred French prisoners. On Sunday the British attacked the German positions north of Thiepval on the extreme western end of their battle line, and obtained a slight advantage at one point, but were elsewhere repulsed.

On Monday the Allies kept on hammering. From the portions of the line which are the scenes of the brunt of their attacks it would appear that the capture of Bapaume, to the north of Péronne, and of Chaulnes, to the southwest thereof, are the objectives which they are at present operating against. Bapaume lies directly north of Gueudecourt, at which village the allied lines approach most closely to the town, a little over two miles separating the two places. While two miles is not a very great distance, it takes some effort to traverse it when every step of the way is stoutly and scientifically contested, and particularly when the ground has to be won by frontal attacks, which is the present case.

On this same day the British did make a slight gain to the northwest of Gueudecourt, and momentarily penetrated the first line trenches on a portion of the German front, but a German counter-attack ejected them and drove them back to their original positions.

Farther south, to the west of Sailly, the French made simultaneously a supporting attack, were unsuccessful therein, and as a net result lost ground slightly. The final result of the day's fighting was to leave the positions of the adversaries unchanged in any important particular on the front north of the Somme. South of the Somme the rival artilleries displayed more than the usual activities, particularly on the line between Ablaincourt, to the south of Chaulnes. There was some hard fighting south of the Somme on Tuesday, where the Germans launched two attacks on the French positions east of Belloy-en-Santerre, which the French completely repulsed. North of the Somme there was also severe fighting at Guendecourt and Sailly, where the French and

WHAT DO I GLORY IN?

A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

TEXT—Jer. 9 : 23, 24. "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches. But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me, that I am the Lord which exercise lovingkindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."

WHAT does a man glory in? At what point does his life leave the plane of indifference and rise into a boast? What is it that provides for him the river of his most exquisite delights? The answer to these questions is fruitfully significant. If we catch a man in his geloryings we take him at his height. A man's boasts reveal his stature; the nature of his admirations reveals the qualities of his life.

Some men'sageloryings are to be found on a purely carnal level; they are sought and proclaimed on the plane of the brute. Other men's glorying have no relationship to the brute; they are found in spiritual realities, among the things of the Eternal. Unworthy glorying is the minister of stagnancy, paralysis, and death. Worthy glorying is the minister of progress, liberty, and life. Let us look at the unworthy gloryings.

"Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom." That is a very surprising negative. I did not expect that "wisdom" would be banned from the circle of a legitimate boast. Is there not an apparent contradiction between the counsel of the prophet and other counselors of the Old Testament Scriptures? "Get wisdom." "Fools despise wisdom." "A wise son maketh a glad father." We know, too, how our poets have spoken of the beautiful thing called wisdom. "Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers"; blossom comes, but the fruitage lingers!

The wisdom here admired is a ripe and matured product, the ultimate issue of a prolonged process. It is not in this sense that the prophet uses the word; he employs it with quite another content. It is the wisdom of the mere philosopher; the product of speculation and theory; a wisdom devoid of reverence, and detached from practical life.

LIFE can be divided into water-tight compartments, having no relationship one with the other. We can separate our opinions from our principles, our theories from our practice. Love of the fine arts can be divorced from the practice of a pure life. Our artistic wisdom can be imprisoned as it were in an iron-bound division, and separated from our moral activities. The musically wise can be morally discordant. The possession of musical technique does not necessarily make an agreeable man. The wisdom of music can be divorced from the other parts of a man's life just as the music room in a hydropathic establishment is shut off from the kitchen.

The wisdom of the ecclesiastic can be a wisdom having no efficacy in the practical life. It can be the wisdom of compartments. A man can be skilled in the decrees of counsel and in traditional lore, and yet he may be morally and spiritually corrupt. The wisdom of a theologian can be a wisdom without influence upon morals. A man may preach like a seraph and live like a brute. He may spend his days thinking out the mysteries of the Trinity, and of predestination, and of the Atonement, and his so-called wisdom may no more color his life than a debate which takes place in the upper room of a public-house affects the conversation at the bar. This is the wisdom referred to by the prophet; the wisdom which is merely esthetic, ecclesiastical, theological; the wisdom of superficial cleverness, which is devoid of all reverence, and which has no perceptible influence upon the daily life. "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom." As John Calvin says, "It is a false confidence."

"LET NOT the mighty man glory in his might." This is a reference to mere animal strength, material strength, the strength of a strong right arm, and a good sharp sword. It includes a bald athleticism in the individual, and a bald materialism in the state. But surely strength is good? Yes, it may be good, it should be good. Athletic strength and skill are very admirable. There is something recuperative in gazing on a magnificent body, not to mention the possession of one. But here, again, the prophet is referring to strength which is devoid of reverence, and therefore strength which is detached from service.

All right use of strength begins with a deep reverence for it. Reverence is creative of self-control, and no one is really far developed in this capacity whose strength is not diverted to the carrying of another's yoke. So it is also with the material might of the state. A sword may be good if it be reverently regarded. "The sword of Gideon," that is always a curse! "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon," that is an instrument of benediction! Strength which is not regarded with profoundest reverence is no fit object of human glorying and boast. "Let not the mighty man glory in his might." It is a false confidence.

"LET not the rich man glory in his riches." Do not let us relegate this warning to a few millionaires. The ease by which we make the evasion is the measure of our peril. The man with a small income may regard his money as irreverently as the man with an overflowing abundance. Twenty dollars a week may be as productive of moral ill as twenty thousand a year. The prophet refers to the spirit in which possessions are esteemed. He refers to riches held without reverence, and therefore not exercised in wise philanthropy. Possessions used irreverently are used blindly, and therefore without true humanity. But how people do glory in bare and graceless wealth! How much there is about us of the empty pomp of mien and manner! It is a false confidence. Here, then, are the unworthy gloryings mentioned by this great prophet of the olden times: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom"—that is the pride of knowledge. "Let not the rich man glory in his riches"—that is the pride of wealth. "Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift is like clouds and winds without rain."

"BUT LET HIM that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord." How far are we away from the brutal, the material, and the merely opinionative! Here is glorying which centers itself in the unseen, and fixes itself upon the Lord. "Understandeth." The relationship is reasonable and intelligent. God wants no blind discipleship. In our younger days, one child would say to another, "Shut your eyes and open your mouth, and see what God will send you!" I am afraid that little boyish practice had been g ned from the thought of the adults, but if it is i ny way suggestive of our relationship to God the relationship is surely partial and incomp te. The Scriptural word is "open!" We are to pen our eyes, our ears, our mouth, our mind our heart! We are to be all alert in our fellow hip with the Almighty. We are to worship him ith all our "mind." "In malice be ye children ut in understanding be men." "Understandeth nd knoweth me." That is a profound term, su es-tive of certainty and assurance. It has a out it the flavor of the familiar friend. We a to use our minds intelligently to discover the thought and will of God; then we are to act on the will, and in our obedience a deep commu on will be established.

This, then, is the line of individual prog ss. We begin in exploration; we use our u erstanding in discerning the mind of God. hen we pass to experiment, and we put to the p oof the findings of the mind. From experimen we shall attain unto experience; our findings w be revealed as truth; our knowledge will ma re unto wisdom. "Then shall we know if we f ow on to know the Lord."

WHAT DOES GOD WANT us to k ow about him? "That I am the Lord w ich exercise lovingkindness." How beautiful he introduction, how gracious the emphasis! We sometimes say concerning a distinguished an whose presence we have met: "I rather f ed him, but his first words made me feel at ho e." And here is the first word of the Almighty, nd the word is not "law" or "statute," but "lo ngkindness!" A dainty dish is served by affec on. "Thou art coming to a King." The wor affrights me; I prefer the sweeter and ten rer word of Faber's:

"Was there ever kinder shepherd,
Half so gentle, half so sweet,
As the Saviour who would have us
Come and gather at his feet?"

What else does he want me to be sure ab ut? "That I am the Lord that exercise loving indness and judgment." Do not let us inter ret judgment as doom. Judgment is vindica on; it is suggestive of sure sequence. When I p nt mignonette, and mignonette comes in its sea on, the sequence is indicative of judgment. J gment is the opposite of caprice and chance. he Lord is a God of judgment, and all my sow gs will be vindicated. If I sow an aspiration, a truth, or a kindness, or a service, the Lord ill surely determine the appropriate issues. H is pledged to the sequence that certain seed all produce certain products. "Whatsoever a an soweth, that shall he also reap." If it were ot erwise we should live in perpetual dread.

All these deeper issues are in the hands of G d. The Lord is a God of judgment, and of righte usness. This word is only confirmatory of the eceding word. Judgment is proceeding, and he Vindicator is righteous. He cannot be bri d, he is not of uncertain temper. "He chan th not." These are the things God wants m to know. In these things he delights! This is ur God. To understand him and to know hi is the only ground of suitable glorying and of ermanent delight. Here is a grand boast: " he Lord is my Shepherd." "I will say of the L d, he is my God." Who can make the bo t?

Nearness to God

MONDAY, November 6. I Kings 18 : 30–41. "Elijah the prophet came near and said." What ayer was this! It was quiet and assured, confi- of an answer, the expression of the calm intimacy God which comes after years of fellowship in ight and act. Notice the phrase with which it is oduced—"He drew near and said." We cannot ess it in words, but we understand precisely what eant. Again and again we have known what it is iave a similar consciousness of access into the ence-chamber, when we have spoken to God as a with his friend, or when we have been able to say rently and humbly, "Thou canst do no other help me here." It is at such times that God is to reply: "Concerning the work of my hands, mand thou me!"

henever we can so lose ourselves in prayer as to et personal interests, and to plead for the glory of , we have reached a vantage-ground from which an obtain anything we are led to ask. "Whatso- ye shall ask the Father in my name, he shall give ou." Our Lord, in his earthly life, had but one sion—that his Father might be glorified; and now will never fail to answer for any of us a prayer h is absolutely selfless so far as we are concerned, entirely given up to the will and service of God. wonderful that the fire of God fell? It could not e been otherwise! But we must not think that is an old-world tale, never to be repeated. Did the Holy Spirit inaugurate this very age with flames of fire? When once the unity of God's people is recognized and his presence sought, he will overcome all obstacles and baptize with fire. F. B. M.

Serving God or Serving Traditions

TUESDAY, November 7. Matt. 15 : 6. "And ye have made void the word of God because of your tradition." The Pharisees and scribes had been criticizing the disciples because they had transgressed the traditions of the elders, and the Master hastens to explain that true religion issues from the heart of man, and is not a matter of following blindly some tradition or custom of men.

A great manufacturer, in discussing education, said: "The colleges are bound by traditions. Our boys learn there what has been done in the past; they get certain customs which have been handed down for years, and seldom do they inquire what direct and valuable relation these customs have to modern life and business. These traditions often handicap a young man, making it hard for him to go against precedent, and sometimes a man, in following his conscience, must go directly against the precedents laid down by men. A man must always be free to do right, regardless of tradition."

If we study the life of Jesus closely, we find that he was a breaker of traditions that had grown up about men and had bound them hand and foot. The Master brought the world back to reality, to God, to the inner laws of personal righteousness. He said to the Jews, who were sticklers for the letter of the law, that to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man, but that the evil thoughts, the false witness against one's neighbor—these come forth out of the heart, and these defile the man.

We need to examine ourselves in the hours of meditation, to find if our. religion is simply doing as some one else does, and always being like the Pharisees, perfectly regular in obeying certain man-made rites; or if religion is deeply rooted in a pure heart and a right motive, and brings us constantly to the questions, "What would Jesus do on this occasion?" "What would I like to have my neighbor do, or say to me, about this particular matter?" C. S. C.

Elijah's Mountain-Top Prayer

WEDNESDAY, November 8. I Kings 18 : 42–46. "Went up to the top of Carmel." The king went off to eat and drink, careless of the awful crisis which was upon him and his people, while the servant of God sought an oratory at the mountain-summit, from which the wide expanse of the Mediterranean spread out to the western horizon. His prayer was very humble. A few hours before, he stood erect as an oak; now he is bowed as a bulrush. Then as God's ambassador he pleaded with man; now as man's intercessor he pleads with God. Is it not always so that the men who live nearest God are the most reverent? True, thou art a child; but thou art also a subject, and the angels of thy Father's presence-chamber veil their faces with their wings as they cry, "Holy, holy, holy!" It was based on the divine promise: "Go, show thyself to Ahab, and I will send rain upon the earth."

God's promises are given, not to restrain, but to incite to prayer. They show the direction in which we may ask and the extent to which we may expect an answer. They are the mold into which we may pour our fervid spirits without fear. They are the signed money-orders, but we must present them for payment. It was definite. He directed his prayer to a specific purpose. It was earnest. Jacob wrestled; David panted as the hart; the blind beggar was importunate, the distracted mother persistent; the prayer of Jesus was marked by strong crying and tears. When you go to the great God, do not mock him by tepid devotion. It was expectant. Seven times over he said to the boy, "Go again." Never be discouraged if at first there is nothing. God will avenge his own elect. The little cloud will appear on the horizon. He will turn and say, "Great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." F. B. M.

Our Wells in the Desert

THURSDAY, November 9. Gen. 21 : 19. "And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water." Ishmael, the son of Hagar, was dying in the desert. The supply of water was exhausted, and Hagar had gone away from her son in order not to see him die. "And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad to drink."

Strange as it may seem, some of the most significant moments of our lives, moments that stand out like jewels in our memory, coloring all the days that follow, are closely connected with hours of disappointment and often bitter despair. Hastily, when sorrow or calamity comes or seems to be at hand, we say, "God has forgotten me. He has left me to die in a desert land." And we lift up our voices like Hagar, and weep.

It is then that so often our eyes are opened, and like Hagar, who saw the well of Beersheba with her newly opened eyes—this well that had always been there—we also are made to see the silver lining of our cloud, and our weeping is turned into grateful joy.

The odd thing about these experiences is that we are so forgetful. The very next time that a cloud arises in our sky we find it necessary to go through the same dismal process of disbelief and of agonizing despair. We forget the well of Beersheba back there in our experience last year. We forget the unchanging character of the loving God who guides the steps of his children, the God who has said: "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." C. S. C.

When Our Prayers Lack Faith

FRIDAY, November 10. I Kings 19 : 1–8. "He requested for himself that he might die." "When he saw that!" If only Elijah had looked higher and seen him who is invisible, he would never have taken the false step of flight. If he had held his ground, dwelling in the secret place of the Most High, and hiding under the shadow of the Almighty, he might have saved his country from the fate that afterward befell it. He missed a chance that never came again. We might have supposed him to be superior to human weakness; but Scripture, with its unswerving veracity, shows us in this incident that he was a man of like passions with ourselves. It is difficult to conceive that the two prayers should have issued from the same lips within a few hours of each other—that on Carmel's summit and this on the level desert sands. Let this lesson at least be deeply learnt—that we must not turn our eyes from the face of Christ to regard the difficulties and opposition that threaten us.

This prayer was not answered in the manner wished. Had it been, there would have been no chariot and horses of fire to transport him home. When we see everything in the pure light of heaven, we shall perhaps thank God as much for the prayers that were unanswered as for those that were. He does not answer the prayers extorted from us in hours of physical exhaustion, nervous collapse, or momentary failure of our faith. At least they are not answered in the letter, though they are in the spirit. His angel comes twice with nourishment and sleep, which fit us to breast again the storm and make our way to Horeb, with its still small voice. This is the divine response to the cry of pessimism and despair. F. B. M.

The Soul's "Moving Day"

SATURDAY, November 11. John 6 : 50. "This is the bread that cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die." The apostle Paul saw this glorious truth when he exclaimed, "For he hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light in the Gospel." All the moral power of death is gone; only the form remains. We shall never see death in the sense of the wrath of the Lamb, the remorse of guilt, or the separation from God. Jesus and his disciples did not therefore often use the word "death." Jesus said, "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth." "Lazarus sleepeth; I go to wake him out of sleep." "It is expedient to you that I go away." Death to Christ was a triumphant tour from Calvary to glory. Death's dominions were only an incident on his way home. Again, Christ said of death, "I will come for you, that where I am, there ye may be also."

Should we not call death "waning night and rising day," or "moving day"—moving out of a tent into a palace—or a bend in the river of life, which flows on forever, or the gearing of life into the wheels of eternity, and when the new adjustment is made, we are crowned and glorified? Ought we not to exclaim, "O glorious departure! O glorious change!" when death is swallowed up in victory? E. W. C.

Through the Orient for the Christian Herald

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—FOURTH LETTER

Japan's Dream of World-Power

I AM held in Yokohama by a storm which has made motorcycling a thing to be dreaded. I have not yet been captured by the wide-awake officers of the government who meet every writer on the pier, fit him with rose-colored glasses and show him the things they want him to see; but I have tried in many ways to find out what the sentiment of the Japanese is toward America, especially at this time when naval expansion in America must necessarily be of interest to the Japanese.

I am surprised at the freedom from jingo talk and the implication of American hatred for Japan connected with naval expansion. So far as I have gone, there is neither hatred for America nor fear of her. The Jiji. Japan's largest newspaper, commenting on the naval expansion, and explaining it by the fact that Americans have been poorly prepared for ten years, and that now, in the face of international unrest, the need for a larger navy and better preparedness is making itself felt, says: "Whoever the hypothetical enemy of America may be, from the American point of view, the present American program is a necessity for that country."

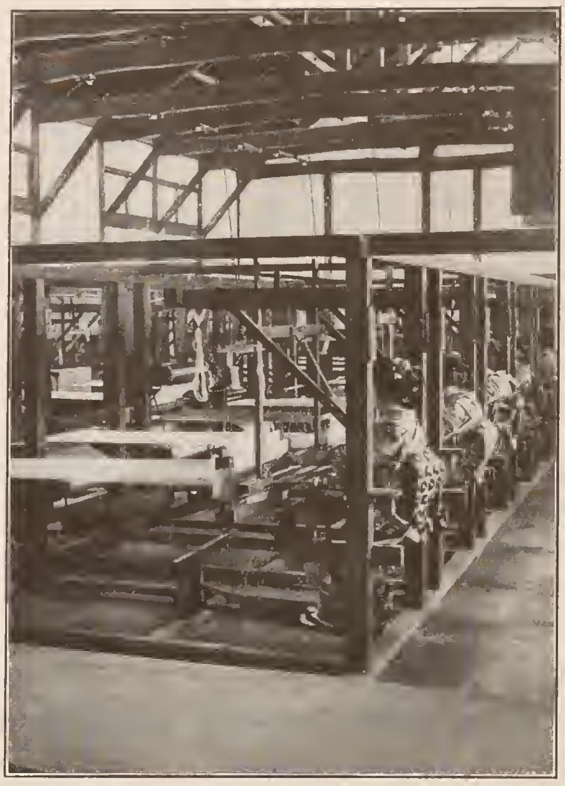
Senator Ham Lewis is coming in for more than an ordinary share of criticism for his ignorance and jingoism, and the unfavorable comment in the American papers regarding the Russo-Japanese convention is causing us to be considered stupid and unwarrantedly suspicious. I was in China at the time that the Japanese demands were presented, and I can see very easily how American writers and statesmen could be suspicious of Japan. Her record in Manchuria, Korea and Shantung has not been enviable. Even now, Japanese citizens are carrying on looting and terrorism in Shantung, cooperating with the robbers and harboring them inside the railway zone, which is still held by Japanese soldiers. This barbarism is not, of course, backed or encouraged by Japan, but neither is it suppressed.

When the Japanese carry out their promises in regard to Shantung, after the reprehensible violation of Chinese neutrality and integrity which they put into force there, I shall be more ready to believe that any convention or alliance in which Japan is a signatory is a step toward peace in the Far East and the open door in China. But the attitude of American papers has hurt Japan's feelings in the matter. One Japanese argument is that Japan at present has an absolutely free hand in the Far East, and that she would never be bothered by Europe if her inroads on China were a fait accompli at the end of the war. Every convention or agreement under such conditions must then be unselfish, for even if the desire were to take what was not her own, why should she voluntarily offer to "divvy" when she could easily have it all?

Yokohama is still talking about the great celebration of the Russo-Japanese convention, when the whole city was gaily decorated. Thousands of special lanterns, decorated with the Russian and Japanese flags, were displayed and there were fireworks and speeches in honor of the occasion. Yet it was only two days ago that, in buying a photograph and needing wrapping paper, that given me was a map of the great naval display in Yokohama at the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese War. There must have been a lot of those maps printed, if they have lasted as wrapping paper for eleven years.

With characteristic confidence, the Japanese still resent the intervention of Roosevelt and the peace terms at Portsmouth, believing that if the war had gone on a little longer they would have made important gains. How much thanks America gets for such efforts is shown in a recent editorial of the Chuwo. After telling how the Americans exterminated the Indians and imported the negroes as slaves, this paper says:

> The white men in America think that they are the superior race. Then came the Japanese immigrants, who do not think of the whites as superior to them in latent power. The Americans tried to exclude the Japanese and found it dangerous to do so. It was the Russo-Japanese War that gave them the idea that to exclude the Japanese is dangerous. The superiority of the whites became baseless. The Americans, who were disillusioned from the dream of the superiority of the white man, have come to note the ability of the Japanese as a race, as shown by the recent Russo-Japanese alliance. This experience on the part of the Americans was valuable. The Americans are now only haunted by bad dreams as a result of the Japanese exclusion ideas. The independence of the Philippines is one of the bad dreams. The Russo-Japanese alliance is another. But the ship-builders and manufacturers are using these bad dreams to further their own interests. Senator Lewis, of the rustic state of Illinois, dreamed that Japan would exclude the Americans from the Orient in turn for the exclusion of the Japanese in America.
>
> Americans, we tell you, America is the great customer for our silk. She is our customer for 200,000,000 yen's worth of raw silk. Poor Japan cannot afford to lose this great customer by any means.
>
> But you see that in spite of our manifest faults, tho few blocks of silk stores on Fifth Avenue will protect us from hat might prove a disastrous war. And they call us comm ial! We might go into war to protect our interests; but uld peace-loving America stay out of a war for right bec e a hundred million dollars were at stake?



Silk weaving on improved looms. Note the general condition of disorder and uncleanliness and poor light so conspicuously absent

The Nichi-Nichi also exhibits feeling tc ard America, saying: "The American eagle shoul not aspire to soar over the Pacific; he has plenty of om at home." Other papers take a more friendly ttitude. The Jiji welcomes America to Chinese l ns, on the assertion that while Japan has little to i est in the development of China, she is bound to ofit from the increased trade with China which a rge loan will inevitably bring. This paper emph zes the need of keeping the confidence and good w of their neighbor on the mainland.

The departure of 931 emigrants on one shi for South American ports breaks all records. Thi vas the Kiyo Maru of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha.

The appearance of the three new liners o the Pacific Mail, whose trans-Pacific liners were ren ved from competition last August, is eagerly aw ed. The almost total monopoly of the Japanese line has caused a discrimination in freight rates in fav of Japanese shippers, whose rate from Kobe to the United States is $8 a ton. By transshipme at Kobe—a privilege which is denied other than J anese shippers—the rate from Shanghai to Amer is ten dollars a ton less than the rates of the P ific Conference, whose charge is $24 a ton. Th is nothing illegal in this discrimination, as Japa an readily fill all her ships, and her excuse to oth s is that she has no space for shipments by other oncerns. All the lines are making huge profits, an the three ships of the newly reorganized Pacific Ma will help to restore conditions to a moro normal stat .

The new Japanese minister to China and th ew Chinese minister to Japan, Mr. Hayashi and Mr. Chang, are expected to bring about better f ing between the two countries. Japan seems to r ize that the alienation of China and the inception the much-dreaded boycott would cause more harm i the end than local advantages in North China, F ien or the Yangtso could offset.

The New Japanese Factory Law

ANOTHER matter of world interest is the pa ing of a new Japanese factory law, which pr ects laborers in a much greater degree than former asures. Even the present ruling leaves many conve ent loopholes, as these quotations will show:

> This law applies only to factories employing more han fifteen workmen. The master of a factory can not ake those under the age of fifteen or women to work more han twelve hours a day, but a competent master can prolo the working hours by two hours, according to the nature the work. The master of factory shall provide holidays a east twice a month for women and those under fifteen ye s of age. In case of incidental necessity, the master of f ory can prolong the working day by two hours, for a peri not exceeding seven days a month.

The present law is a step in the right directio out it leaves much to be desired. However, many ms find themselves embarrassed at this governm tal show of humanity.

Visitors Unwelcome

'' is as hard to get into a Japanese factory as it is to break out of jail. It can be ne if the proper amount of red tape is vound; but the tradition is that visitors welcome—to stay outside. That is a cimen of Japanese politeness. The ker for information is welcome to do at he has no desire to do, and welcome argue and fume as much as he wants to loing it; but he does it in the end. The panese have reached the point of be-ing that the wages of sin is publicity, l either to protect valuable secrets, ich other nations discovered first, or to vent foreigners from exposing inhuman working nditions, the entrances are barred and a "no ad-ssion" sign is as literal and true as a "no fishing" n would be if hung over the babies' bath tub.

We ere then own to the ception ble. Hus-ng the East useless. As chatted, we tched the clerks work as industriously as Japanese rks do. A Japanese student tries hard to pass his aminations and become a graduate so that he can ke life easy and draw small pay for the rest of his e.

The man I watched did not do one stroke of useful labor in the quarter-hour we were there. He smoked two cigarettes, played with his counting-board, and put on his coat; but otherwise he did no productive labor. His companions did the same type of work. An American would not pay ten cents a month for all they did while we were there.

The chief official returned, after some time, to say that he was sorry. When a Japanese is sorry for you, it is time for you to sympathize with yourself. He explained that the brother of the manager had brought down a correspondent of the London Times, and that they had to refuse him admission because he did not have a letter from the manager himself. As I am not a citizen of a world-ruling nation, I took my turn-down very gracefully, and executing another Beaucairean bow, we withdrew.

Our next choice was a factory for the compounding of a Japanese Worcestershire sauce. We thought they would have more "pep" there. But the half-mile rickshaw ride was all for naught, and with more low bows of deepest respect, we reentered our closely curtained rickshaws and pushed on through the storm.

Fisher knew the manager of factory number three, devoted to the manufacture of the Nipponophone, which is Japanese for "His Master's Voice." We were courteously received by the "Number One Man," who would be known in America as the general manager.

"Now what can that wild-looking foreign man see about us that is worth taking a picture of?"

A Plant Where Efficiency Rules

IN the Nipponophone plant scientific management and efficiency are being developed, and the office looks like an office and not like the smoking-room in a leisure man's club. Typewriters clicked away and reminded me of the old "city room" in New York, and there was an air of business about the place which seemed the more wonderful after our visit to the spinning mills.

Of course, cotton goods sell themselves, to a great extent, and though a talking machine may be said to speak for itself at times, it requires an efficient selling force to introduce a novelty of that kind to the gentle natives of the South Seas.

What especially interested me at the Nipponophone factory was the fact that all the dies and machines for manufacturing the mechanical charmers are produced on the premises. Some of this is intricate and delicate work, requiring a high degree of exactness, but the machines rank with the best in standardization tests. Some automatic machines, made by Browne and Sharp, are used in spite of the low cost of labor, but a considerable bit of semi-scientific and accurate work was done by the Japanese under native direction. Every part is weighed or counted, and a perpetual invoice accompanies the goods from the time they enter as brass and wood till they emerge as professional entertainers.

The utilization of waste products from the record-stamping department, to make composition turn-buttons for electric lights, was also new enough to the Orient to be worth mentioning. In America we serve a pig to the rich, who throw the meat away. But the by-products are utilized for a thousand things which the best people use long after they have had the waiter or the butler remove the fat from their table. In Japan the opposite is the case, and by-products are not often efficiently utilized. But the high price of other materials enables the record factory to produce composition turn-buttons, made from waste records, at a marvelously low cost. (Mr. Williams's next letter will continue his story about the factories and introduce us to other interesting scenes.)

High-Tide Evangelism

FROM many quarters there come to us intimations of a deep spiritual desire for a revival, or intelligence of revivals already begun. It would seem that the stream of the evangelistic forces is setting in toward high tide. Boston, staid and conservative, has been working on lines of preparedness for the opening of a revival on November 12, under the direction of Evangelist Billy Sunday. Over 700 cottage prayer meetings were held in a single week recently, besides midweek meetings in various churches, at which prayers were offered for the divine blessing on the coming work. It is proposed to have two great choruses of two thousand voices, to alternate with each other, and additional choruses, to bring the whole force of singers up to eight thousand, are now being organized. Sacred song is becoming more and more a potential feature in revival work. Dwight L. Moody used to say that the power of song could move as many souls as the appeal of the most eloquent preacher; and any one who recalls the wonderfully attractive singing of some of the great Gospel soloists of the past—men like P. P. Bliss, Philip Phillips, Burke, and Ira D. Sankey—will readily agree with this view. New York is busy with arrangements for the coming revival next year, when Evangelist Sunday will undertake to awaken the conscience of the big metropolis. Music will be one of the dominant features, on a larger scale even than has been known in Gospel work heretofore. Four hundred churches are interested, and a guarantee fund of $100,000 is being discussed, the object being to eliminate the public appeal as far as possible. We think this is a wise and judicious arrangement, and that every care should be taken to avoid financial squabbles such as have followed some revivals in the past, detracting greatly from the spiritual value of the work. Taken all in all, the coming winter promises to be the most active that evangelism has known in many years.

The Spirit to the Churches

SOME of the addresses delivered at the recent Protestant Episcopal Church Convention in St. Louis were remarkable, among other things, as giving evidence of the changing attitude of the church toward wealth. There was a time in the early history of Christianity when the possession of riches was not considered to be a legitimate aim either of the church as an organization or of the individual Christian. But the lure of opulence, the love of ease and pleasure, the potentialities that resided in the mere possession of wealth, gradually produced their effect. Then came a time when it could be said truthfully as was spoken in stern rebuke of the church in Laodicea: "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Whether this is the condition of any of our churches today, we must leave to others to determine. The evil of leaning to wealth is not confined to any denomination, but it is a wholesome and welcome sign of spiritual renovation when the churches themselves are taking inventory of their opportunities, and are sincerely striving toward spiritual efficiency. Since the great war burst upon the world, with all its frightful accompaniments, the church has seen a new vision of its own shortcomings, and happily also of its possibilities. These Episcopalian bishops are by no means alone in the advocacy of a closer union between the churches and the common people. The great Founder of Christianity was welcomed by the multitudes, and we are told that while few of the rich and great heeded his doctrine—except possibly to cavil and dispute over it—"the common people heard him gladly." When the churches follow the example of the Master, and make no distinction between rich and poor, influential or humble, but put all on an equal footing of Christian brotherhood, with a ready welcome for the poorest, then there will no longer be any complaint of the desertion of the church by the working class because it is controlled by the rich.

"When Wealth Accumulates"

AMONG the things the war has brought to us must be reckoned disillusionment. We are a big nation, rich and prosperous, and our wealth and prosperity have been increased amazingly in these two years. Wall Street is in its speculative heyday. Never were fortunes made so quickly. There are scores of Americans whose riches make the traditional opulence of Crœsus look like a back number. But something has happened. In eight months our imports of diamonds alone reached $35,500,000. Formerly there were many Americans who regarded France as degenerate, England as old-fogyish, Germany as over-ambitious, Austria as a tottering empire liable to go to pieces, and Russia as hardly semi-civilized. We were the salt of the earth, and the most progressive of nations. What has happened to bring about our disillusionment is told by the New York Evening Mail in these words:

> Mighty changes have been wrought in the last few years. War has stripped France of its follies, Great Britain of its stolidness, Germany of some of its illusions and all Europe of its fungi.
>
> Europe is transformed. The walls of class have crumbled. The institutions that centuries have developed and that tended to promote ease, luxuries, vanities and indulgences have been torn away.
>
> The war has been one of devastation, but it has been one of regeneration also. Europe has been purged of many of its evils and has had the spirit of self-sacrifice, patience, fortitude instilled into its soul.
>
> Do Americans appreciate what this change portends for them? How many realize that war has made Europe virile and the stupendous inflow of wealth has a tendency to make America decadent; that the whole situation has been reversed; that Europe is being made strong and America weak?
>
> American workers are becoming habituated to a high wage scale and a high cost of living, while Europe's millions are being taught to save, to conserve, to sacrifice in order that the nation may endure.
> And what are the wealthy and the educated doing? In America we have the lesson of $100,000,000 a year for diamonds, rubies, pearls, etc.; of an extravagance and daring in dress never known before; of luxury upon luxury, of two or three shows a night; of a day that in one part of the city begins at midnight; of $10,000, $20,000 and $30,000 apartments becoming so many as to occasion little notice nowadays; of million share days and two million share days on the stock exchange; of a Rockefeller with more millions twenty times over than all the millionaires of America had in the middle of the nineteenth century.

In this indictment the principal point is that it is true in the main. The war seems, to a great extent, to have killed our national ideals and chilled some at least of our strongest characteristics. Our very prosperity becomes a menace to our happiness and self-respect, when we reflect that many of these sudden fortunes have their roots in Europe's suffering. And, as the Evening Mail has pointed out, the rich are growing richer and the workers are living at high cost, while thrift is totally neglected. It is a picture which recalls the familiar lines of Goldsmith:

> "Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, > Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Put Your Heart in Your Work

WITH one eye on his work and the other on the clock as its hands approached quitting time, a clerk in the office of a Philadelphia contractor made an error in an estimate which was not detected until a contract had been made, involving the firm in a loss of $150,000.

The clock-watching clerk gave the excuse that he was only half-paid. But results show that, though only half-paid, he was over-paid. One eye is not half as good as two eyes. Half a mind is not half as good as an undivided mind. Half-pay is too much for half a man.

It is not only the errors that cause direct disaster which count, but, even more costly still, in the long run, are the frequent little errors that call for constant supervision of a man's work.

The listless worker wastes more than his own time; he wastes a lot of the more valuable time of the man above him, who, in order to make good his deficiencies, has to keep a watchful eye on all his work. A careless, inefficient worker may actually cause more work to others than he does himself.

Many an employee seems to be satisfied to stay just within the line of safety from discharge. He is interested in nothing all day so much as in the clock at quitting time. He works not to get his work done right but to put in his time and get his pay. His work does not mean to him occupation—his service—but only his "job." He is a mere job-holder. He is not a worker, but a shirker.

On the other hand, there are employees—hosts of them—to whom their work means their best possible service, their fullest enthusiasm, their keenest joy, their highest life. These are the bone, the brawn, the blood and the brain of all business.

This is a sound aphorism: "If you never do more than you are paid for, you will never get paid for more than you do." This stands for honesty, for fidelity and for efficiency. It stands for purpose, for zeal, for skill and for achievement. It recognizes the value of sincerity, of integrity, of enthusia n. It places manhood and service above everything e. It is a guide-post to genuine success in any ployment.

The enthusiast who put his life into the makin of the first rude lens did a humble thing, yet he li d mankind nearer to myriads of new worlds. The n or woman who only adds columns of figures, if y always be added right, is a very bulwark of succes l business.

It doesn't matter much really what one's posi n may be, so long as one fills it well. The main t g is to fit into one's place, whatever the place may e; and when one does that all other things take e of themselves. There is no superiority but n superiority of service. CHARLES GRANT MILLE

"For His Sake"

THERE is an abiding spiritual charm in t se words, so often spoken by the Master, wh se heart was a perennial fountain of sympa y and love. They have been the inspiration of the st there is in theology, the incentive to world-embra g human kindness, the genesis of countless philant opies scattered everywhere, and their fragrance s filled the world. It is for his sake that we e reached out to succor Europe's stricken ones b a charity so vast and far-reaching that all marvel it and recognize the Christ-spirit in its amazing exp nsion and still more astounding efficiency. God ne r allows any work, undertaken in the name and for e sake of Jesus, to fail. What is being done for e wounded, for the widows and orphans, for the d olated homes of Poland, France and Belgium, is e strongest indication of the great truth that the wo l-war is being divinely used as a means to stir m 's hearts to deeds of love and brotherly kindness and f-sacrifice. Not for worldly applause nor for f-gratification, but "for His sake," are we carrying is burden. And in the bearing of it there is joy d blessing.

In the appeal which is made in the present issu of the Christian Herald in behalf of the unfortu e peoples of Syria and Armenia, there is a special not of interest for those who recall the fact that the s ppliants are natives of the Bible lands which gave b h to Christianity, and where the earliest church s founded. They have, therefore, a very special cl n on our goodwill. What a magnificent thing it wo d be were Christian America, from its boundless esources and inspired by love and helpfulness, to se l, as Christmas draws near, a gift worthy of the nati 's great heart to these sons and daughters of the lan of the Bible, "for His sake."

Only Nine Days More

THIS is almost the last opportunity we shall h e to warn our readers that on November 10 e price of the Christian Herald will be raised fi n $1.50 to $2 a year. All those who wish to take adv tage of the opportunity to subscribe at the old p e should do so AT ONCE, as the price will positivel e raised to $2 on the tenth of this month. We ll accept subscriptions at the old rate provided they o not extend beyond December 31, 1917.

As we have stated so many times, this rise in p e is not of our own seeking, but has been forced u n us by the greatly increased cost of white paper, of i , binding and mailing charges, electrotyping, d so forth. We are not alone in this movement, s many other publications have been compelled o announce a rise in price. As a matter of fact, sc e publications less popular than the Christian Her d will be compelled to suspend business on acco t of this tremendous increase in price of mater . We, however, have received the assurance of h 's of friends who have declared their intention of sta ing by the Christian Herald at the advanced pr . This gives us confidence that the Christian Her d during the coming year will be more influential t n ever. Certainly, we will do all in our power to enha e the quality of the publication.

In the meantime, however, there are some w , with every good wish in the world, have felt that e general rise in the cost of living would warrant th n in curtailing the amount of periodical literature to e purchased during the coming year. But we do t believe any of these friends will want to do with t the Christian Herald, and so to give them a cha e to remain with us during the coming season, t s opportunity is provided; i. e., to subscribe at the d price AT ONCE.

Remember! November 10 is the date on which e price will be raised.

elebrates Important History

RECENTLY the 175th anniversary of the Congregational Church at Amherst, N. H., was celebrated. An Old Home Day med the program. An historical dress was made by Rev. Charles E. hite of the Congregationalist Church, t formerly a pastor at Amherst. v. A. Z. Conrad, of Boston, preached the evening. A song itten by Mrs. A. Z. Con-l was sung at that eting. The church is e third oldest of the nomination in the ited States, having been ganized September 22, 41. The present meeting use was built in 1772. ng pastorates have been e rule at Amherst. The st century saw only five storates, and four min-ers officiated during the venty years following. ost famous was Rev. athan Lord, who resigned 1828 to become Presi-nt of Dartmouth Col-ge. The present building s a quaint history. It as built by church and wn. In 1828 the con-ection between church d town was severed and 1832 the town sold the eeting house to the urch at auction. At at time the town re-rved the title to the ock, bell and steeple, d also the right to use e building for public eetings. But to enforce is provision the original eed puts the ownership one south door and a wer window in the town. he church paints the uilding, excepting the wn's door and window, ith a shutter, the clock nd belfry. Usually the wn votes to paint its roperty at about the ame time and with the ame color of paint. The church insures s building and the town has another olicy on its door, window and bell. The uaint feature is not the most important ne in the historic church. It is the fact hat for 175 years a true Gospel was reached, souls were saved, men and omen were aided by worship in right iving and unselfish doing, the town as blessed, and Christ's kingdom as promoted; that it was the gate to piritual life for so many generations, nd also the gate of eternal life. For the ne and three-fourths centuries the ongregations happily attended the hurch services, reflecting this sentiment: "I was glad when they said unto me, Let s go into the house of the Lord." (Ps. 22 : 1.)

Gives School for Playground

LOUIS RENARD came to this country a poor immigrant boy from Berlin and with his family settled in Saint Louis, Mo. He was twelve years old and went to the public school to learn the English language. His father was so poor that he had to strike out early to make a living. He got a place as cash boy in a store at $2.50 a week; then a clerkship in a house-furnishing establishment, and is now the head of a prosperous business concern. His feeling of gratitude to the old school which taught him the new language and gave him the new opportunity was so great that the other day he bought the old school site and made a present of it to the city of St. Louis as a playground for children. Swings, benches, lawn tennis courts, baseball diamond and other equipments have been provided for the health and happiness of the children. This man's action illustrates two beautiful sentiments: one, appreciation of the value of the public school; the other, love for children and a desire to make them happy. How dearly Christ loved children! God made children for play, and play for children. There is this mention of the playful instinct in Bible times: "And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." (Zech. 8 : 5.)

Saves Woman from Shark

AT the close of the bathing season a terrible shark tragedy was barely averted. Mrs. Naomi Lenormand, 65 years old, of New Dorp, Staten Island, was wading in two feet of water on the beach at that place and only fifteen feet from shore. James Temple saw a commotion in the water and a very large fish rushing toward her. Temple shouted to Mrs. Lenormand to get out of the water. At that moment she saw the shark and fainted with fright. Temple ran to her rescue, and as he was dragging the woman to shore, a nine-foot shark followed and snapped at her. Then it turned and swam off to Munger's Pier, where it was seen for half an hour. Life guards ordered every one out of the water. There are sharks among men in business, in society, in the moral and spiritual realm. With sharp teeth and voracious appetites they feed upon the possessions and character of their victims. Stronger laws are being enacted and they are being better enforced to protect society against these sharks, and institutions of reform are reaching out their hands of beneficence to rescue those who may be within their grasp. These savage man-eating sharks in society answer pretty well these descriptions: "For without cause they have hid for me their net in a pit, which without cause they have digged for my soul. . . . They rewarded me evil for good to the spoiling of my soul." (Ps. 35 : 7, 12.)

Cervantes Monument in San Francisco

AS a gift to the city from two prominent Spanish residents, J. Molera and J. J. Cebrian, a monument to Cervantes, author of Don Quixote, was unveiled in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, September 3 last. Differing radically in design from ordinary monuments, the memorial was made by J. J. Mora, Spanish painter and sculptor. A bronze bust of the famous Spanish author surmounts a rough stone pedestal at the foot of which Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, modeled in bronze, kneel respectfully, Don Quixote in the medieval armor which he wore so bravely during his erratic knight erranty. Miguel de Cervantes, one of Spain's most brilliant writers, was born at Alcalá de Henares, October 9, 1547, and died in Madrid April, 1616. He was scholar, poet, writer of many works, soldier maimed for life in battle by a gun shot in the left hand, and author of the immortal satirical romance, "Don Quixote." In this great satire Cervantes intended to put an end to that taste for extravagant romances of chivalry that had so long prevailed, by burlesquing the absurd and affected romances which it was then the fashion to read and which were believed to be true chivalry. He also showed that the deeper and truer and more guileless a nature is, the more will it invite jest and ribaldry. He also taught that the pure heart and high soul obtain a triumph which misfortunes and blunders cannot tarnish, for the knight, always "disinterested, generous, elevated and beneficent," maintains throughout a firm hold on our affection and esteem. Cervantes got no pecuniary benefit out of his "Don Quixote," and had it not been for the Count of Lemos, who became his patron, he would have died in abject poverty. It is said no stone marks his burial place. When the house in which he lived in Madrid was rebuilt in 1835 a bust of him was placed in front of the building by the sculptor Don Antonio Sala. What a man and what a book to have maintained such a hold upon the best thought and sentiment of the reading world for three hundred years! How befitting the statue! The burlesque on the spurious manhood of his time, its empty vanities, its silly ambitions, and ridiculous effeminacy, was to enforce the lesson of a true manhood thus expressed: "Be strong, and quit yourselves like men." (I Sam. 4 : 9.)

Cuban Leper Goes Home

A SON of a wealthy Cuban planter was about to enter Tufts College in this country when it was discovered that he had leprosy. He was sent to the Massachusetts leper colony on Penekese Island, where he remained until recently, when he was allowed to go to New York in an automobile and take a quarantined cabin back to his home. He will live on an isolated tract of land and no one but his immediate family will be allowed to go near him. The young man will read with deep interest that Dr. Lopez Del Valle, Director of Sanitation of Cuba, announced that he would submit to the National Board of Health a new cure for leprosy discovered by Angel Garcia, a countryman without scientific education of any kind. He claims to have cured himself, and they say his remedy has wrought improvement in several cases at the leper hospital. He has found an herb that does the wonderful work. If the National Board of Health will try his remedy he offers to give the secret to the public. Leprosy was considered a horrible disease in Bible times and was considered incurable, and a type of sin. There is this record of Christ healing the leper: "And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean." (Mark 1 : 41.)

Laughs Herself to Death

AN investigation by the coroner at Pottsville, Pa., the other day, revealed the fact that Mary Bofano, a beautiful girl of sixteen, who fell dead in South Centre Street in that city, laughed herself to death when her lover, who was walking with her, told her a joke. A heart paroxysm followed with almost instant death. Mental states have a wonderful influence on the body. Occasionally an excess of joy overexcites an uncertain heart as in the case of this girl, but grief is a fruitful source of damage to the body; it will break down a strong nervous system, and unsettle a naturally good heart. Death interrupted the joys of the lovers, and brought black night down on their brightest earthly day. The tragedy of the laugh is a sermon with this text: "Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." (Matt. 24 : 44.)

Large Melon Crop

ISAIAH HAINES of Georgetown, N. J., is said to have had the melon record for South Jersey this season. He pulled 2,300 watermelons from one acre of ground and got $500 for them. The yield would have been enough to buy a little farm in some parts of the state. Melons are raised in most of the warm countries of the globe. Georgia would laugh at the stories of New Jersey's record watermelon yield. She raises, it is said, the most delicious ones in the world, and enormous quantities of them. The attempt to cross the thin-rind Georgia melon with the citron to make a thick rind to stand the jolting of the cars and the ocean shipments has proven a failure. The rind is thick and the scant meat is pale and not at all palatable as compared with the luscious Georgia melon. The children of Israel in their murmurings over the good things made this mention of melons: "We remember the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic." (Num. 11 : 5.)

Asks for Prison Locks

DOMINICK GUGLIELMO, a Sing Sing trusty and a member of the Mutual Welfare League of the prison, when he heard that his father was dying asked for leave to visit him. When this was refused, his desire to go became so ardent that it frightened him, and fearing that he might be tempted to try to escape he refused to go out into the prison yard and begged his guard to lock him up. Later word came that his father had died, and he was again released. His place of trust in the prison, he felt, called for especial caution in facing temptations that might be too much for him. We are taught to resist evil when we have to face it, but the better way is to shun it entirely. Many a battle that need never have been fought is fought and lost or else barely won with scars left for life. "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." (Matt. 26 : 41.)

A Book, an Apple and an Easy Chair

By JEAN WHITE

IT had been a long, hard day, and I was very tired. When I found that every one was out and the big front room was empty, I looked at the glowing fireplace with a sigh of content. It was not often that I had such a pleasant prospect of rest.

The easy chair was by the fire. There was a plate of red apples on the table near. In my hand was the book for which I had been vainly trying to find time all the week.

I sank into the soft cushions of the chair, took a bite of the apple, and opened my book—when the bell rang! With a smothered exclamation of impatience I reluctantly went to the door.

On the step stood a slight girlish form. A low quiet voice inquired for the doctor. I was glad to say that he was out, and had almost closed the door, when the soft voice persisted, asking with a smothered perturbation when he might be likely to return.

Assuring her that I did not know, being only a roomer in the house, but that his office hours were over for the day, I turned involuntarily to glance longingly at my easy chair awaiting me. She then spoke of the weather and of the prospects of rain. I replied without interest.

Still she lingered, and leaned wearily against the side of the door, and began to inquire the way to some place to which I could not direct her. I told her that I was almost a stranger in the city.

"Ah, then you must be lonely," she said.

"No," I replied, then waited for her to go. I was thinking regretfully of the precious moments slipping away, while there awaited me the book, the apple and the easy chair.

For a full minute we stood there in silence; then, with a sigh pregnant with hopelessness, she turned, and, saying "Good-by," quietly went down the steps.

Slowly she walked away without a backward glance. I half expected her to turn back for another attempt at conversation. So eager was I to find my comfort that I hastily shut the door, and soon was absorbed in the pleasure of the book, the apple and the easy chair.

THE next morning at breakfast some one said casually, "That heading sounds good to me: A Book, An Apple and An Easy Chair." Then as he folded the paper and went out to work, "Good copy, that!"

I was startled. The phrase had not left my lips the night before, though it had been in my mind, after I let the woman go, for my selfishness upbraided me. I bought the morning paper at the corner news-stand, and read:

A BOOK, AN APPLE AND AN EASY CHAIR

A LETTER picked up at the foot of Powell Street early this morning is the only clue to a mysterious suicide. It is supposed to be that of a well dressed young girl, whose body was found in the water near. The note speaks for itself:

To the Occupant of the Easy Chair:

You with your apple, book and easy chair turned aside and ignored last night one who had despaired. You might have induced me to take heart again had you only given the slightest sign.

Through your open window I saw a picture that touched my lonely soul. I stood outside for a moment; then the comfort and cheer of the glowing fire, the temptation of the rosy apples, the lure of the book, and the invitation of the easy chair drew me irresistibly, as they doubtless had drawn you. But all these were within your reach. They were beyond mine—unless—a sudden impulse—a last appeal—and with this hope I rang the bell. My aching heart gave one more throb for the life I still coveted, though I had decided to leave it. The world had treated me too shabbily. I was friendless.

Perhaps there was yet a chance to win the sympathy of a fellow-sister, perhaps a friend; and I rang your door-bell.

You stood and listlessly replied to my question. I could not interest you. I saw the doctor's sign and used that as an excuse when I saw your face and knew that you would not understand a direct appeal for sympathy. It was only a little friendly interest that I needed. I was so desperately lonely—and stranded.

I dared to hope that you might invite me in. I tried to induce you to do so, determined that if I could find one human being, even one, who cared enough to speak to me kindly, I would take up my burden of life again and go on. But there was no one to care. No one in all the world to care in the real way, whether I lived or died.

So I made the wager with Fate—and lost.

You went back to your book, your apple and your easy chair.

I—came on to the river.

"God Save Armenia!"

THERE are many indications of a great national response to the appeal in behalf of suffering Armenia and Syria. When President Wilson issued his recent proclamation setting apart Saturday, October 21, and Sunday, October 22, as days upon which the American people might make their contributions for the aid of those stricken races, he gave the weight and dignity of high official emphasis and approbation to a work which had already begun, but which needed vigorous reinforcement.

It is shown by consular reports that these remote districts have been scenes of slaughter and suffering on a scale that is appalling. Before the war, the Armenian population of Turkey, Persia and Syria was estimated at two million souls. Of these, 750,000 have been massacred or died of wounds, disease or exhaustion. Of the 1,200,000 survivors, a million are destitute and starving. These include not only Armenians but Nestorians and other native Christians in Turkey, Persia, Syria and Palestine—all Bible lands. These people represent the oldest existing form of Christianity, and it was in the effort to exterminate them for this reason, and because they would not accept an alien religion, that they have suffered so much. There is probably no country known in recorded history whose people have suffered so heavily for the Christian faith as Armenia.

There are today 500,000 homeless and destitute refugees in Damascus, Zor and Aleppo dependent on charity. In Turkey proper there are 300,000 more in the same pitiful condition, and 200,000 in Persia, Anatolia and the Caucasus.

The American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief made the following announcement on October 11:

CHRISTIAN HERALD LEADS WITH $15,000 FOR ARMENIAN RELIEF IN RESPONSE TO PRESIDENT'S APPEAL

The first large gift—$15,000—in response to President Wilson's appeal for the suffering Armenians and Syrians reached the office of Charles R. Crane, treasurer of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, 70 Fifth Avenue, this morning. It was from the Emergency Relief Fund of the Christian Herald. The check received this morning makes a total of $20,000 which the Christian Herald has sent to Armenia; $5,000 having been cabled some time ago through the State Department to representatives of the Committee in Turkey.

The editors and management of the Herald are entering into a wider publicity campaign in behalf of these suffering peoples and stated today that the check just received would be followed by others as rapidly as possible until provision had been made for at least the necessities of life for these people.

Among the letters received by the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee in New York is one from Dor el Zor, Syria, which tells how the little children are dying of hunger. It tells of young girls being sold for bread by half-crazed parents, and of mothers throwing themselves into the rivers, rather than see their starving children die. A letter from Han[illegible]n tells of a camp of a thousand Armenians in tents, and all the occupants perishing slowly of hunger and misery, gnawing bones and eating grain refuse and grass. A letter from Sepka, another concentration point, tells of 2,500 refugees, gaunt as skeletons, with many deaths daily and grave-diggers always busy. At Etchmiadzin 11,000 died of starvation, and 40,000 more in the surrounding country. Refugees arriving there were almost naked. Six thousand of these unfortunates were deported to Ana, five hundred being killed on the way by Arabs. At a place called Haleb there are 25,000 little orphans whose parents have perished in the cruel persecution. In a village of 450 souls the solitary survivor was one woman who escaped the general slaughter almost by a miracle.

The Christian Herald has no desire to shock the hearts of its readers by a recital of these horrors; but the truth, the great outstanding facts of the situation, must be told. Our American missionaries, in conjunction with our consular representatives, are doing all that lies within their power to help the destitute survivors. It is a fortunate thing that they are able to accomplish even this. They are looking to us to supply the means of saving life and alleviating suffering.

CHRISTIAN AMERICA has done much for Armenia in the past, and now, in the hour of that country's direst need, we cannot turn a deaf ear to the despairing cry of the perishing one. America has done noble work in helping Belgium, Poland and Serbia, and in many other ways in softening the blows inflicted by the war, which have fallen on the helpless women and children and the non-combatants. We must now make an effort to save Armenia, to gather up the remnant of this ancient Christian people and feed, shelter and clothe them under our protection in their own land.

Every reader of the Christian Herald can help in this great life-saving campaign conducted "In His Name." You can do th

The Christian Herald,
New York City:

On behalf of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, I wish to assure you of our deep appreciation of your prompt response to the President's proclamation in contributing to the Armenian-Syrian Relief Fund.

Yours was the first large check that we have received in response to this recent appeal of the President.

The $15,000 that you have thus sent through our Committee, plus the $5,000 sent direct to the State Department, will doubtless save many thousands of lives during the coming winter.

We trust that through the columns of the Christian Herald you will keep the needs of these innocent, non-combatant, but nevertheless war-trodden people before your readers, in order that they further help us make adequate provision for food and shelter for the hundreds of thousands that will be dependent upon us this winter.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) C. V. Vickrey.

by ending your contribution today to th Christian Herald, which is working hal in hand with the Relief Committee an the missionaries. Remember that evy dollar given to this worthy cause go undiminished, in the care of the Ste Department at Washington, and th the donor has therefore the highest asrance that his gift will reach the mk. Churches, Epworth Leagues, Cstian Endeavor Societies, Baptist Yng People's Societies, Sunday scols, and all similar organizations will find here a glorious opportunity for the most practical kind of Christian benevolence.

We have shown you the need; now do your share, and send with your gift a prayer that God may make it a means of saving one life, of rescuing one poor sufferer from starvation; of bringing a ray of comfort into one sad family group in these scattered homes. Let our prayer be "God save Armenia," and let us try to help him to do it.

"The People's Choice"

And you will endorse it.

If all our mothers and wives and sweethearts voted at the polls next Tuesday the returns would doubtless show the same difference of opinion between women-kind as there is between their more or less exalted lords and masters.

But when it comes to home economics, kitchen cabinets and the domestic policy of three meals a day, practical women are all of one party. They all vote for

Campbell's Tomato Soup

There couldn't be much difference of opinion about a food so pleasing to the taste, so nourishing, so convenient to use and to buy.

The whole family enjoys it. The children crave it with genuine eagerness when once they know how good it is. And they know it is far better for them than cakes and candy.

The older ones like it for the appetizing zest it gives to the entire meal, and the satisfying after-effect.

The busy housewife usually tired with the never-ending routine of daily cares and duties—finds welcome relief in a dish so easy to prepare, so wholesome and sustaining.

The truth is that no other food can take the place of a good soup for strengthening digestion and building up vitality and nerve force.

As a Cream of Tomato, is one of the favorite ways to serve this delicious soup. Have this for dinner today, and "put it to a vote" at your table.

Sparkling
GELATINE
Each Package
Makes 4 Pints of Jelly

ORANGE CHARLOTTE

½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine	2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice
½ cup cold water	1 cup orange juice and pulp
½ cup boiling water	Whites of three eggs
1 cup sugar

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in boiling water. Add sugar, and when dissolved, add lemon juice. Cool slightly and add orange juice and pulp. When mixture begins to stiffen, beat, using wire whisk, until light; then add whites of eggs, beaten until stiff, and beat thoroughly. Turn into mold that has been dipped in cold water and if desired line mold with lady fingers or sponge cake. One pint whipped cream may be used in place of whites of eggs. Other fruits or nuts may be added.

APPLE CHARLOTTE

Make same as Orange Charlotte, using cooked apple pulp in place of orange juice and pulp.

Each package of Knox Sparkling Gelatine makes four times as much jelly as the so-called ready prepared kind.

Besides jelly, Knox Gelatine makes Salads, Puddings, Candies, etc.

New Gold in Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE completion of Uncle Sam's railway will be the beginning of a new era in the mining camps of Alaska. The road will give easy access to many thousand square miles of new territory and will pass through regions where the precious metals are known to exist. It will cross the Kenai Peninsula, which is peppered with gold and which contains working mines, both placer and quartz. The first gold found in Alaska was discovered there in 1854 by a Russian engineer, but, in the changing conditions, the camp was abandoned and the discovery forgotten. Over twenty years ago workable placers were found on the northern part of the peninsula not far from where the railroad now runs, and they are still mining there. The total output of the peninsula has been in the neighborhood of two million dollars' worth of gold and only a small part of the country has been prospected or scratched.

Even less work has been done in the country running north to the Tanana Valley. About forty miles from Anchorage are the Willow Creek mines, where they have recently taken out several hundred thousand dollars' worth of quartz gold with a little stamp mill. Willow Creek is about 170 miles north of Seward, and perhaps 300 miles from Fairbanks. Three mines are working there now, and there will be more when the coal from the Matanuska fields can be brought in by the railway.

On Broad Pass, over which the road crosses the mountains at an altitude of about 2,500 feet, silver-lead ores are reported, and a little farther north is the Bonnifield district, consisting of gold placers which have already yielded considerable metal. And then there are the Skwetna and Yetna mines, west of the Talkeetna River, 'where they are thawing placer gold out of the ice, and to the north and west is the Kantishna mining district, which contains not only gold, but antimony.

Antimony has risen in price since the war in Europe, and it is now worth several hundred dollars a ton. Another valuable mineral which is being mined near Fairbanks is scheelite. It is a high-grade tungsten used in the making of ammunition. The concentrate is now selling for over $3,000 a ton. As to the Fairbanks district itself, it has many gold mines, both placer and quartz.

In all of these gold regions, the output depends on fuel to operate the machinery and to generate the steam needed to thaw the mass of frozen gravel and ice in which the gold lies. The gold may be fifty, or even 150 feet below the surface. It has been held there in its frozen vault for thousands of years, and heat is the only key that will unlock the door and let the gold out.

In the mines about Fairbanks they have been paying $15 and upward a cord for the wood from the spruce, birch and cottonwood trees near by. This wood is soft and of small heating value, two cords of it being equal to only one ton of soft coal. When the railroad is finished the miners will get coal for $5 or $6 a ton, and this will represent a heating value for which they are now paying from $30 to $32. This saving alone means big dividends to many mines that are now wavering between profit and loss.

The coal for the Fairbanks mines will come from the Nenana coal fields, through which the railroad will pass. These are the largest in the basin of the Yukon. They have many veins which run up to twenty feet in thickness, and there is one that shows by actual measure sixty feet of coal. There is an area of more than 40,000 acres that is known to be underlaid by this coal, and coal is found here and there over 384,000 acres. Many of the outcroppings have not yet been tested, and no one has estimated how much coal there may be.

Traveling through a gold country like this makes one covetous. Everyone thinks gold, talks gold, and, considering the prices at the restaurants, I might almost say, eats and drinks gold. You see so much gold in the mines and the banks that you feel like the beggar boy with his nose flattened against the glass window of the candy store. There is plenty to be had were it not for the barrier between you and the taking. At the clean-ups of the camps, I have handled gold nuggets as one handles shelled corn, and at the assay offices I have held up $10,000 worth of pure gold in one brick. While at Dawson I saw $200,000 worth of bricks wheeled about on a truck such as you find at a country railroad station.

I MET here at Fairbanks a man who has melted more than $50,000,000 worth of gold dust and nuggets, and who is now making bullion to the amount of $3,000,000 a year. This is Mr. G. E. Beraud, the assayer of the First National Bank. He is a chemist and metallurgist of note, and was the government assayer at Dawson when they were getting out gold by the millions.

All of the banks here buy gold, and each has its melting pots where the dust and nuggets are turned into bricks for shipment outside. You see these gold bricks on the bank counters. Some are as small as a cake of sweet chocolate, and others are so large that if one fell on your toes it would crush them to jelly.

The assaying and melting is usually done outside the bank. Mr. Beraud's shop is a rude zinc shed not much better than the portable houses used for automobiles. It contains a little furnace and the various implements of the assayer, including molds, bone-ash and scales. The scales are so delicate that they will weigh a pencil mark on a sheet of fine tissue paper or a single silky hair of a baby.

The gold dust is brought in to the banks by the miners in bags of buckskin as big around as your arm and about a foot long. Such bags are called pokes. The banker takes the poke and pours the metal out on the scales, and then either pays cash outright for the gold according to weight or gives the miner a credit slip which entitles him to its actual value after it has been turned into bullion. The gold dust is of different values. Some is mixed with silver and is not worth more than $13 an ounce. Other gold dust may be worth $20 an ounce. When the dust comes to Mr. Berand it is assayed—that is, it is melted and its gold contents tested.

The assay is made after the gold is cast into bricks. From each brick a corner is cut off with a chisel, the amount taken being about the size of a marrowfat pea. This is hammered out on an anvil and run through rollers until it is as thin as newspaper. A little strip of this gold leaf is then taken off and weighed on the fine scales above spoken of. It is so treated by melting in a furnace that the impurities are taken out and a little button of pure gold is left. This button is weighed and its weight is subtracted from the weight of the strip before it was melted. The result shows the amount of pure gold in the brick; and there are tables giving its value in dollars and cents.

I asked the assayer whether he did not covet the metal he handled. He replied:

"I never think of the value. I have been working in gold so long that the stuff seems to me just like corn or oats in the hands of a farmer. It is like the raw material used in machinery. It was different when I first began to assay at Dawson. I had never seen gold dust and nuggets in quantity before and I almost went crazy. I liked the look of the gold and I bought nuggets and had gold pins and chains made of them. I wore a nugget as a scarfpin and had nugget cuff buttons. After a time I grew tired of them and gave them away."

MINERS are always generous and a community like this is far more charitable than those of a long-settled country. Said Mr. L. T. Erwin, the United States marshal at Fairbanks, to me the other day:

"The people here are the most generous on earth. It is no trick to raise to send a sick man or woman out Only a few months ago a man was t outside with a trained nurse, and en money was sent along to pay his hos expenses in Seattle. I have live Alaska eighteen years, and in all time I have not seen one person beg

"We have, you know, many u cessful men. I remember an inst of a man who came to Fairbank make his fortune, leaving his wife family outside. He found no gold finally fell sick and died in a cabin o of the creeks. When the miners lo over his papers they found a letter had just come from his wife, who in a little town in Massachusetts. letter was full of news about the that had been born since the father left and inside it was one of the ba stockings. The miners stood aroun dead body in the cabin as the letter read, and when the stocking was s the tears ran down their faces. O them reached out and took the stoc He pulled forth his poke and poure enough gold dust and nuggets to fi the toe. Another miner poured in dust, and this kept on, the stocking ing from hand to hand until it was fi But all had not yet contributed. I end it was passed around the w camp, with the result that $5,000 w of gold dust was collected and money therefor sent to the widow.'

United States Marshal Erwin has unique distinction of being the only who has ever driven a flock of tur from the Pacific Ocean across the m tains into the Klondike gold region. had been talking about old time Dawson when he told me the story

"My father lived near Danville, in one of the chief turkey and g raising sections of the United St When I was a boy turkey raising a regular business there, and we so times drove our turkeys and gees far as sixty miles to the markets. had to put shoes on them before star out."

Thereupon I laughed. "You need smile," said the marshal, "that is truth. We made the shoes by dri the geese through the melted pitch, then through sand. The sand stuc their feet and gave them a pair of shoes, as it were. Well, when I ca to the Klondike and saw the high pr they were getting for poultry, I cluded to make a fortune by brin in live stock from outside. I left camp and went to Seattle, wher bought 600 chickens and 84 turkeys took them on a steamer a thous miles northward to Dyea, and f there sent the chickens by wagon the pass. The turkeys I drove. It no trouble except they would pe in stopping at night. You cannot vent a turkey from going to roost w the sun sets. I tried it, but the turk would jump up on the rocks. might push them off, but they w go on a few steps and then get up ag To make a long story short, I finally them over the range, and down to L Lebarge, where I took them by into Dawson.

"But I had to learn how to sell th There was a great competition am the provision men as to having fr fowls, and every one wanted to co the market and crowd out the oth When I entered the first store and t them I had eighty turkeys and chickens, the dealer's face fell, for saw that he could not monopolize s an enormous proposition as that. changed my plan, kept my mouth s about the supply, and began to pe them out in small numbers. I got apiece for the turkeys, and from $ $10 for the chickens. I went from st to store and restaurant to restaur until I had sold all but twenty turk and sixty chickens. These I got ri to one man at $10 per turkey and $5 chicken. Altogether, I got $3,000 of my chickens and $2,000 from turkeys, so that my gross receipts the trip were $5,000."

Wilson Keeps Us Out of War!

How Our President Applies the Golden Rule in a World Aflame

By GEORGE A. DORSEY, Ph.D., LL.D.

Before the Great War had fairly got its rivers of human blood well started toward the sea of oblivion, American public opinion voiced a belief and a prediction:

Christianity Is Bankrupt; Europe Will Not Let Us Stay Out of the War

The month of August, 1914 was for every American hours and days of fear, dread, consternation. As the days wore on, each more red, sullen, bloody; as each day saw the unexpected happen; as the flood of human blood widened, deepened, reddened; the world's marts closed, one by one; as the world's purse-strings tightened ever tighter; and as the world's business closed down upon thousands and ever-increasing thousands of unemployed; strong men looked each other in the face and with bated breath asked each other "What next? What is to be the end?"

The year 1914 dragged its monstrous, loathsome length along, and 1915 came—with new forms of International hatred and new expressions of International frightfulness. Then came the Lusitania!

Public belief now became certainty—Christianity is bankrupt; and public prediction saw itself fulfilled—Europe has dragged us into war!

Right here, please bear in mind that this Democratic Administration on March 4, 1913, inherited bad times, Boss Rule, and an "affair" with Mexico. Before the year was up bad times had given way to confidence, and we were on our way.

Then that Great War cloud began to spread like a pall over American business—trade was paralyzed, the banks began to hoard gold and issue clearance-house receipts, confidence was destroyed. "It comes," whispered scared souls, "it comes—the Panic! The War!"

Wilson Was in the White House

"We can't keep out," timid souls kept saying; "Europe wont let us stay out of this war. Do you suppose they are going to tear each other's throats, drain each other's blood, and blow up each other's wealth—and let us stand by and pursue the paths of profitable peace?"

That question was asked not by this or that man, but was the big question that travelled back and forth and up and down the continent from Maine to California, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. It was asked by presidents of railways, of banks, of corporations, of trusts; by the man in the street, the blacksmith at the forge, and the farmer at the plow. And the opinion actually prevailed in America that in some way, somehow, we would be dragged into this monstrous thing. And panic got its myriad slimy legs at work and began to crawl forth—but it never reached the Man in the White House!

Public opinion had overlooked our greatest asset for sanity—

Wilson Was in the White House

Wilson administered the nation's affairs in conformity with the spirit of American independence and in accordance with the principles of Christianity.

His four years' experience pre-eminently gives him that "efficiency" which Mr. Hughes properly demands shall be the equipment of the man who is to guide the nation's destinies during the next four years.

His opponent—lawyer that he is—failing facts for honest criticism, resorts to unseemly abuse, finds fault where none exists, ignobly overlooks obvious virtues, and thus seeks under cheap ridicule and carping criticism to reinstate his backers, the Old Guard, who while preaching "Liberty" and ranting "Rights of Man" stole the country blind.

Wilson's democracy is as broad as his republicanism, and his progressiveness is based on conceptions gained from a knowledge of history and his belief in the nation's destiny.

He Has Kept Us at Peace

With the world afire he has kept us at peace. He dared the nation to do right—as became a statesman, a Christian, and a man, and the President of the richest, strongest and most self-respecting nation in the world. Every American can thank God for his citizenship and look his flag in the face—its record has never been cleaner or more honorable. Nor have we had to surrender a single conviction of honest and fearless men. Our national consciousness has been robbed of the brutality of a mob swerved by passion and the greed of those who profit by the flow of blood.

He has not been stampeded to do the bidding of reckless capitalists who would exploit the national resources of Mexico.

Daring Predatory Wealth, both in Wall Street and at the ballot box, he had the courage to throttle an antiquated financial system based on a fifty-year-old-Government-need to sell bonds and which had been so manipulated as to concentrate the people's cash in the hands of the ring and restrict credit for the use of its friends.

He dared remove the tariff so far from politics that it no longer shuts us out of world-commerce, violates every decent principle of taxation, and makes our Government a facile tool and a silent partner in the hands of private interests.

He Brought Prosperity

He brought to the nation a degree and a kind of prosperity unparalleled in world history, and enabled us in four years to reach a position in resources and resourcefulness, in wealth and in individual and collective intelligence, supreme among the nations of the world.

His far-reaching intelligence saw that we were from fifty to one hundred years behind in scientific, economic and business-like methods of agriculture—hence the Rural Credits Bill which gives to agriculture the efficiency of great business enterprises, and to the farmer the same access to credit that has hitherto been reserved for the merchant and the manufacturer; hence also the Good Roads Law, which will save hundreds of millions of dollars, facilitate human intercourse, check the urban tendency, and add enormously to the value of farm land.

He humanized human labor—freed it of its enslavement to insensate corporate greed; gave it a Bill of Rights, a Magna Charta; and abolished Child Labor. By law, the injunction can no longer be abused in labor disputes, nor is man's labor a commodity open to barter and sale like inanimate things.

He has prepared us to defend our national honor, as we were never before prepared; insured us against war and its indescribable horrors and iniquities; and guaranteed the nation against foreign aggressions.

Is Not That a Record?

The future historian will agree with Dr. Eliot, the distinguished leader of American scholarship, that this Administration has done more for the nation than the Republican Party accomplished in five times as many years, and that the period from 1912 to 1916 will be memorable in the history of the United States for the extraordinary amount of good work that Wilson's Administration has accomplished.

"Speak Softly and Carry a Big Stick" is a good motto for a prize-fighter, and "Might Makes Right" conquered Belgium—but neither is a worthy slogan of the Leader of a Christian Nation! Christianity has not won her victories in that sign nor has civilization made permanent headway under that banner. If the Golden Rule is good conduct among the men of the earth, it is better conduct for the nations of the earth; and until international ethics are at least comparable to business ethics and the code of honor among Christian gentlemen, we must go on with reasonable preparedness and continue to expect wars.

Woodrow Wilson is the greatest President America has produced since Lincoln. He has done his duty. By his works you may know him. He has never disappointed nor deceived. There is no "bully" in his vocabulary, nor "big stick" in his armory. And he has made good! His administration has prepared and defended us; abolished panics; levied income taxes; controlled iniquitous trusts; conserved national resources; stamped out graft and special privileges from legislation; slain the Bosses and wiped out the Lobby; made agriculture a business, and humanized labor; and added so much progressive, constructive, business-like and humanitarian legislation to the statute books that the Progressive Party had to go out of business. The country needs him. He has been fair to the American people—the American people believe in fair play—they know a good man when they see him. Would you like to go back to Taft? Roosevelt chose Taft—who betrayed the people, says Roosevelt; yet today both back Hughes—as do also Penrose, Smoot, Crane, Barnes, Mann, and Cannon; and what else? The G. O. P.! Same old Crowd. Same old Bosses. Same old Lobby.

Christianity Is Not Bankrupt

Its greatest commandment has been written into the nation's law. We are not at war. We have won our victories by the reasonableness of our cause. We know where Mr. Wilson stands. We know what we may expect of him. If the Golden Rule is good enough to guide us in our dealings with our brother, it is good enough to direct our course with our neighbor nations; and it should serve to point the way on November 7th!

Questions and Answers

H. H., Cedar Springs, Mo. We know that God is omnipresent, and it is the general opinion that the devil is a wicked spirit and is also omnipresent. Can two spirits occupy the same space at the same time?

In Scripture the evil spirit is likened to a roaring lion (I Peter 5 : 8), going about seeking whom he may devour—that is, seeking to find entrance to the hearts of men, so that he may ultimately destroy their souls. The heart in which Christ is already enthroned is guarded and defended against temptations and surprise attacks, and the evil one can find no entrance. It is only the heart that is unoccupied, or which is filled with doubtful thoughts and purposes as tenants, that can be captured, because its defenses are all down and there are no guards set. (See II Peter 2 : 20; Matt. 12 : 43-45.) It is quite evident from God's Word, as well as corroborated by human experience, that the spirit of evil cannot occupy simultaneously with the Christ Spirit the heart of a man. He may assault and batter it till doomsday, but the soul that rests on Jesus gets new strength, new power of resistance, after each attack.

L. E. B., Cleveland, Ohio. It has been conclusively shown, by the experience of the European nations, that militarism and preparedness lead, not to peace, but to war. If the Christian nations had followed the teachings of Jesus Christ, we believe there would have been no war, and the world would have been spared the awful horror it is now facing.

Subscriber, Attica, Ind. 1. God is both just and merciful, and the measure of his mercy we cannot estimate. The question you ask as to the origin of evil has caused much controversy. God is the source of all goodness, and no evil dwells in him; but "with the withdrawing of his guiding and protecting Spirit from man, evil comes." Evil is the negation of good, as darkness is that of light. The soul that seeks to obey God and to know his will is under the guiding and protecting power of the Spirit, and will be kept from evil. In the case of Cain, there is reason to infer, from the Bible narrative (Gen. 4 : 3-7), that he had not come to worship and sacrifice in the right spirit, but had put away the fear of God from his heart, leaving it a prey to evil suggestions. He knew the divine law, but, being proud and headstrong, he acted independently of it and was thus, in a sense, a rebel against God even before the sacrifice. One sin led to another until the culminating tragedy was reached. 2. The doctrine to which you refer is Universalism. It is at variance with all revealed religion, and is rejected by the Christian Church.

J. C. F., Mount Carroll, Ill., who classes herself as one of "the old young folks," sends a plea for more consideration for the comfort of a very large class who love to attend church. She writes: "My locomotion is not as good as it once was, and I find it is with much difficulty that I can climb the stairs to our churches on the Lord's day. Consequently I can better understand why my mother, then in feeble health, was unable to attend worship, unless a church without stairs could be found, which was seldom the case. It was a source of much regret to her, as she dearly loved the services. The thought then came to me that she is only one of many, no doubt, who must be deprived of attendance at divine worship because of the climb they must make."

A. B. C., Oklahoma. What is the fate of the Jews who pass away? Will they be lost because they do not accept Christ?

It would be pure speculation to answer a question concerning the ultimate fate of the Jews who have passed away since the death of Christ. We have no right to judge men; judgment belongs to God alone. Besides, in all ages he has raised up witnesses to himself in the persons of godly men and women who, although they might never have heard the Gospel message, have lived according to their highest lights in a way that may have been acceptable, and whose faith has been accounted to them for righteousness.

H. M. T., Argyle, N. Y. Why did Jesus spend whole nights in prayer? Was it to ask for strength to endure the suffering which he knew was to come?

We must consider that in Christ there were joined and combined the two natures, the human and the divine. Now, how readily can we see that the human side of him was weakened and humiliated at the thought, not only of what was before him, but of the tremendous responsibility he was taking upon himself of bearing the world's sin and atoning for it. Is it then to be wondered at that he frequently sought refreshment and strength in long periods of uninterrupted communion with the Father in prayer and meditation. Even at the last, in Gethsemane, in his human weakness, he makes one more appeal to have the cup pass away, but his divine nature triumphs, and, refreshed and strengthened by the assurance he receives, he drains it to the last.

Nara, Elgin, Minn. You are apparently somewhat confused as to the laws and usages relating to banks and banking systems. The office of a "sight draft" is to collect for the drawer from the drawee resident in another place, money to which the former may be entitled either on account of balance due or advances on consignments. In other words, to fit your case, in order to draw money on your brother in another state, it will be necessary that your bank send to your brother a draft or letter. If he accepts it, your bank will pay you the money.

Subscriber, McClelland, Iowa, writes: "I herewith enclose a five-dollar bill for the War Orphans. I have sent money direct to Osterwald, Hanover Province, Germany, where I have distant relatives, but on account of a letter from Austria lately published in the Daily Nonpareil of Council Bluffs I have quit sending money. The letter, which slipped by the censor in Austria, stated that one-half of all money sent to individuals in Austria went to the government. I take the Christian Herald and hope you can have something to say of this in the paper, but it might hurt the cause of benevolence, too, if it became public."

Our own experience in making remittances to the warring countries has been satisfactory. In no single instance has there been any interference, official or otherwise, and all funds sent have reached their destination. We have heard rumors of the sort mentioned in Subscriber's letter, but have regarded them as sensational, or as instigated for the purpose of reflecting upon the governments immediately concerned. As to the charge of misappropriation, we regarded it as unbelievable.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

All Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A SHUT-IN of Andover, Mass., writes to the Prayer League: "For several months I have been a shut-in, and summer has brought many prayer experiences to me. At first feeling alone and in need of companionship, I prayed earnestly that God might be more real to me. After a short time I felt his presence as never before. . . . I believe the Lord has given me this summer a clear call to the ministry of intercession, and I rejoice in it and that I can be counted among the workers of the Lord even though shut in from active service."

Mrs. L. P., Traverse City, Mich., asks prayer for a friend who, though a young mother of but twenty-four years, is in a sanitarium suffering from nervous breakdown. She asks prayers that this mother may be restored to her three small children.

A. B. C., of Winthrop, Me., tells us that some years ago he was broken in health and threatened with a foreclosure of the mortgage upon his home, but that prayer brought him strength and sufficiency of income so that the home was saved. He feels that the present success of his six children is also an answer to prayer.

A mother writes: "Some eight months ago I requested prayers for my son, who was losing his eyesight. He is now able to attend school. May God's richest blessing rest on the League and on the Bowery Mission."

A grandmother tells of the great sorrow that came to their home in the disgrace of a son-in-law, and of the comfort which prayer brought to her as she tried to explain to the eleven-year-old grandson the inscrutable ways of Providence. The son-in-law, having served his sentence, is now making good in the West, kept by the power of prayer.

A wife in Lynn, Mass., came home from a shoe factory tired in body and broken in spirit to find her husband almost discouraged because of lack of work. She was driven to her knees and found there peace, rest and a certain hope. The next morning her husband was summoned to work, and she has been so kept that in spite of the hard work of the factory she has not since felt the weakness of discouragement.

Mrs. R. E. W. writes that she is a firm believer in prayer. Some time since she wrote to the Prayor League asking that an estrangement between near relatives and herself might yield to the grace of God. A few days later she received the first letters in more than a year, the letters being dated on the same day as her letter to the League. Is it not possible that Sister W. was estranged by the coldness of her own heart, and that her prayer was answered when she herself evidenced her willingness to forgive by the writing of her own letter?

Mrs. J. M. H. asks that the League pray with her that a way may be found to pay off a pressing mortgage which threatens to deprive her and her children of their home.

D. D. writes a rejoicing letter. A brother, a victim of the drink habit, has been cured in answer to the prayers she requested in his behalf. She writes: "He with his wife and child are now all members of church. He is like a new man, and we trust he will so continue."

J. L., Seattle, Wash., asks prayers for recovery from a severe sickness. "Pray that God will heal my body and save my soul," he writes. Mrs. H. M. W., North Yakima, Wash., requests prayers in behalf of a "good Christian minister," that he may have a church given him, and find support for his family. "Sister," Madison, Miss., asks the prayers of the League in behalf of a brother addicted to the drug habit, that he may be relieved from this bondage and reconciled to his family. I. G. S., Berkeley, Calif., requests prayers for a revival in the church of which he is a member, "that every member may be sanctified and ready for service"; also prayers for a Christian mother, who has a hard struggle to keep her seven little children together, that her eldest son, now in the United States army, may be brought to Christ.

An old lady of sixty-four asks the prayers of the League that God may help her to overcome a bitter trial that has come into her life.

Friend, Antwerp, N. Y., writes that prayers in her behalf have been answered. "My debts are paid, not just the way I looked for, but God's way, and I want to thank the League for helping me." She now requests prayers in behalf of others, that their hearts may be changed, and that they may love the Lord's house more; also that a son may be cured of the liquor habit. These, with hundreds of other requests, have been laid before God in prayer by the League.

PRAYERS are asked for revivals of religion at: *Artesia, New Mexico; Los Angeles, Calif.; Gainesville, Fla.; Cana, N. C.; Libertyville, Ill.; Olivet, Mich.; Northfield, N. H.; Cape Horn, Wash.; Clinton, N. C.; Manton, Mich.; Naponee, Neb.; Anderson, Ind. (that many may be saved during revival); Warren, Mo. (that many may be saved during meetings being held at the Baptist Church); Milan, Mich. (for the success of special meetings to be held in the church); Everett, Wash. (for the success of revival meetings here); Port Defiance, Va. (pray for the upbuilding of the church, and blessings upon the young people's meetings, also the success of revival); New Burlington, Ohio (pray for a sweeping revival to spread over the nation); Moundridge, Kan. (for the success of a revival to be held here); San Bernardino, Calif. (that we may win in our fight against the saloons); Baltimore, Md. (pray for the Prohibition victory here); Funk, Neb. (that Nebraska may be voted dry).

Three parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; "Isabella" asks prayer that mother's mind may be strengthened; Mrs. A. C. asks prayer that husband's mind may be restored; fourteen friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other relatives or friends or for themselves.

Three friends ask prayer that their mothers' sight may be restored; E. M. K. asks prayer that eyes may be healed; V. P. asks prayer that father's sight may be restored without an operation; thirteen friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for other relatives or friends.

Fifty-eight friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace and assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Seven parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; Mrs. E. J. M. asks prayer that a physician may be cured of the habit; six wives, their husbands; sixteen ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from the liquor habit.

E. F. E. asks prayer that daughter may be cured of the morphine habit.

A mother asks prayer that her son may be saved and return home; M. E. S. asks prayer for the conversion of three sons; forty-two parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; eighteen wives, for the conversion of their husbands; eighty readers ask for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Eleven readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for others.

Ninety-six ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. J. F. M., who asks prayer that a Sunday school scholar may regain the use of limbs; eighty-six friends ask prayers for healing for themselves, including Miss C. B. A. and Mrs. C. V. K.; M. J. S. asks prayer that health may be restored without an operation; H. P. T. asks prayer that an operation may be successful; M. M. D. asks prayer to regain the use of limbs; sixteen friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Thirty-nine friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs, including Mrs. J. F. M., that a way may be opened to raise money for the repairing of the church.

Sixty-two friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

"It is good not to drink wine." Rom. 14 : 21.

We must not please ourselves in respect to any indulgence which has been deadly in the case of a fellow Christian. The matter in question may seem to us altogether trivial and unimportant. Our conscience, so far as God and we are concerned, may be perfectly easy and at rest, but if others have been led into perilous positions or tempted to fall through what we allow for ourselves, we must put our own pleasure and use aside, and forego even a harmless thing for their sake. We cannot afford to risk the soul of any for whom Christ died. If he shed his blood for such, surely we may shed a little self-gratification. At the same time we must make it clear that we are not to be bound or limited by people's scruples and questions. The apostle is free to admit that we must procure p

The Christian Attitude Toward Social Problems

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE have in this chapter of the letter to the Romans a truly Christian statement concerning two of the difficult problems of the early church. Stated in general terms, Paul's principles here laid down are applicable to all the great social puzzles of our day, and notably to the alcohol issue.

In Paul's day there was the question of meat offered to idols. Much of the market product was of this character; it had been used in sacrifice to the pagan gods. Was it therefore "tainted" with heathenism? Could a Christian eat it? If he did, might he not be accused of participating in the idolatrous ceremonies? To Paul himself an idol was nothing; the services did nothing to the meat; he could eat it without question and so advised his Corinthian friends. Yet he recognized special cases where he and others would abstain because of the law of love and the conscientious scruples of another.

The other vexed question arose over the gradual substitution of Sunday for Saturday as the Sabbath Rest Day. The Lord's Day, the day of resurrection, the first day, became the generally accepted Christian Sabbath. Some Jewish Christians felt this to be very wrong, and indeed there are fine, stalwart Christians today who feel as thoy did. But the great majority took the view that the leading of the Spirit warranted the departure from the letter.

Respect for Sincere Opinion

SO Paul laid down his principle of respect for the opinions of others, the true basis of Christian tolerance and the source of progress. The freedom of the individual is recognized. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. One man eateth to the Lord, thankfully; another abstains, to the Lord, thankfully. Sincerity of conviction is the desirable thing: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." In order to have that, there must be free choice, no coercion, no condemnation. We must not judge one another; that is, censure, denounce, on matters of prayerful conviction. Good men havo often differed—yet in the love of Christ they can cooperate for the upbuilding of his kingdom. The delusion of uniformity has filled the church with persecution and unbrotherliness in past eras. Diversity in unity is possible. One great dead level would be monotonous and unprofitable. We long for a great unity of Christendom, but it must be a unity of spirit and purpose—not of creed and organization. We must respect the convictions of all parties and denominations, and yet find a way to cooperate fully, joyously, fraternally, for the salvation of the world.

Still Greater Respect for Welfare of Souls

BUT there is a deeper principle even than that of toleration of opinion—that is, concern for the spiritual and temporal welfare of our fellow women. Important as correct and it Builds them up

KRUMBLES is the new whole wheat food, produced by the Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Company. It is the only cereal made from Durum Wheat, which is considerably more nutritious than any other wheat.

Durum wheat is particularly rich in protein, phosphates, and mineral salts, the foods that build muscle and brain—rich in starch, the great energy food, and rich in bran, with its valuable laxative properties.

Krumbles is the whole of the Durum wheat, cooked, "krumbled" and deliciously toasted. Its fascinating flavor is created by an original and exclusive method of the Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Company, which brings out the full richness of the wheat—a flavor never known before in all the thousands of years people have been eating wheat.

There is nothing more nourishing for growing children and invalids than a dish of Krumbles with milk or cream. The strength-giving properties of Durum wheat make Krumbles an ideal winter cereal.

Go easy with the sugar—the more you chew Krumbles, the sweeter it tastes.

self-controlled man is irked and irritated by the limitations of his fellow Christians. If he is selfish and arrogant, he will not "bear" the burden of their "infirmities." He will "please himself," as Paul puts it. But the higher law of sacrifice comes in, and the bigger, better, stronger he is, the more important that his example should be careful and considerate of actual conditions. "Let not your good be evil spoken of."

For example: in a certain college the president is fully persuaded that he can have wine on his table in moderation. No one would think for a minute of questioning his sobriety and his will-power. Yet in that college are hundreds of young fellows not yet of age, who think it smart and manful to frequent saloons, to be "men of the world." They think prohibition or abstinence narrow-minded because the president so thinks. Scores of them are laying the foundation of an alcoholized career, some are absolutely ruined during their stay, nearly all are becoming bad examples to a drink-cursed age.

They do not see that their much-prized open-mindedness and respect for all opinions should include due consideration of the growing opinion that alcohol is too dangerous and treacherous to be trusted. Nor do they see that we may have the most receptive and liberal minds, giving and taking opinions with all men—and yet be forever narrow-minded toward sin and moral wrong, and eternally opposed to any custom, product or habit that is weakening human life and damning human souls. If there were any other single substance, drug or preparation that was doing equal damage, we should be equally opposed to it. Alcohol is, however, Satan's chief aid.

Personal Liberty

IT seems clear that the liquor interests, in their fight to keep their gigantic profits, are willing to jeopardize human life and happiness still further. One of their misleading watchwords is "Personal Liberty." It is only a blind for their personal profits, but many are misled thereby. One public man said he would rather have "England free than England sober." As though a drink-sodden nation could be free! As though sobriety were not the only true freedom! Can it be possible we shall always confuse liberty with license? Or consider it tyrannical for the government to suppress any business that ruins morals, creates criminals, and weakens the human fabric of the commonwealth?

To a Christian his rights are subordinate to his responsibilities. Where his brother suffers, there his own freedom becomes undesirable. If Christ gave his life for weak erring humanity, we can at least give up the dubious right of self-indulgence in a physical thrill and sensual stimulus. For drink "destroy not the work of God." Rather, "build up your neighbor" even by self-restraint (Rom. 15 : 2).

Luther's great epoch-making treatise on "The Liberty of a Christian Man" cut the shackles of superstition and ecclesiasticism that bound the souls of men everywhere. Yet, marvelous in its insight, one half of the book is entitled "The Christian Man Is Servant of All and Subject to Every One." The liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free creates within us a desire for service and unselfish helpfulness to others, that they may share with us true freedom from the bondage of sin.

The Saloon Trap

PAUL speaks of a stumbling-block, an occasion to fall, which is in our brother's way. The stumbling-block is the "figure four" under a rabbit trap which drops the deadfall on its victim. In my own state there are rigid protective laws for animals. It is unlawful to trap partridges or pickerel, or even to trap skunks out of season. Yet the state licenses saloons, man-traps, boy-traps, which all the year round set their stumbling-blocks and occasions of falling in the way of the young. New victims are being sought, advertised for everywhere, lured by lights and music and entertainment. All too little is being done to extend protection to human beings equal to the protection given to game animals. We have spoken against saloons, we have prayed against them, but in scores of communities we have not yet labored until they are voted out of existence.

Perhaps you have heard of the little girl whose brother trapped song-birds. First she talked to him of the wickedness of his conduct, but in vain.

Then she prayed every night that the Lord would keep the foolish little birds away from the trap, but he did not do so. Then, to use her own words, she "went out and kicked the nasty old thing to pieces." The Christian Church is almost in a frame of mind to kick the saloon trap out of the nation. Why? Because of concern for the welfare of souls, because our boys and girls, our young men and women, are of "much more value than many sparrows."

Is there any doubt whatever as to where Jesus and Paul would stand on the alcohol question, the American issue today?

Howard Arnold Walter set a worthy standard for every boy and girl in these two verses which he called "My Creed":

"I would be true, for there are those who trust me;
I would be pure, for there are those who care;
I would be strong, for there is much to suffer;
I would be brave, for there is much to dare.

"I would be friend to all, the foe, the friendless;
I would be giving, and forget the gift;
I would be humble, for I know my weakness;
I would look up, and laugh, and love, and lift."

A Prison College

ACCORDING to Dr. Waller H. Dade, director of the Bureau of Prisons in the Philippines, this bureau is conducting at Iwahig, near Palowan, a prison colony which is self-supporting, and which sends a man out after his term of service, a better citizen than when he entered. At present there are 1,400 colonists located on 100,000 acres. Every prisoner with more than a year to serve must learn a trade. Prisoners enter the colony through their good behavior in the other prisons on the islands, and are ranged in four classes, entering as a member of the fourth class and earning the right to advancement. When a prisoner has been a year in the colony, he may send for his family or may marry. If, in the choice of trades, he elects the study of agriculture, he is given 12½ acres, and the government furnishes a work animal, implements, seeds, builds a house for him, and assigns an instructor to teach him. There is a cooperative store at which he can trade, and he shares with the government half and half until it is reimbursed for the goods furnished him. There is a market for all the produce he can raise. If he has children old enough to learn a trade they are admitted to the trade schools of the colony. Fifteen per cent. of the prisoners stay on at the colony after they have served their terms, continuing to work on the farms, and those who leave receive additional good conduct allowances, and the government transports them to their homes and buys back such of their portable possessions as they may have acquired in the colony. The colony is governed under the honor system, and thefts are rare. All the business of the colony is conducted by the colonists, who operate the lighting and water systems. Those who do not work the land, work in the power house, and in the workshops. There is work for all, work that means better efficiency and greater earning power when a sentence is finished. It is said that the stigma of the prison does not cling to the prisoners when they return to their homes, and that the prison is really an open door to honest endeavor, education and thrift. A majority of the graduates of the prison are self-respecting citizens from the day of their discharge; for they have learned how to live honestly.

The Three Hardest Jobs

where motor car bearings must stand the acid test of service

In the modern motor car there are many places where anti-friction bearings are used — and in any car you will find at least two kinds of bearings.

Any one of several makes can be said to be used in hundreds of thousands of cars.

How then can you discriminate between them?

By finding out — not what bearings will do the easy jobs — but what bearings are actually being used by experienced manufacturers at the places where they get the heaviest loads and the hardest knocks.

And of all such places there are three that stand out as the hardest that anti-friction bearings have ever had to tackle.

On the spindles of the front axle in both pleasure and commercial cars—where the bearings must carry almost half the car's weight and at the same time resist the tremendous side-pressure called "end-thrust."

On the pinion shaft, in the rear axle of a pleasure car where the bearing must combat the constant tendency of the pinion to climb the big bevel gear and resist the end-thrust that results from the teeth of the gears working at an angle.

On either end of the worm, in worm-drive commercial cars, where the bearings must hold in leash the boring end-thrust of the worm and at the same time resist the crushing downward pressure as the teeth of the worm slide into mesh with the curved teeth on the worm wheel.

It is at these three crucial points that you will find the greatest number of Timken Bearings.

Bearings that "stand the gaff" on the front axle, the pinion shaft and the worm can be relied upon to give lifelong service at all other hard-service places—in the rear wheels, on either side of the differential, and in the transmission.

Car builders know that Timken Bearings are not built for the easy jobs. They are designed to carry the big loads, to resist the terrific forces that are ever present to wear and destroy.

The evidence is plainly printed on the pages of Booklet D-5, "The Companies Timken Keeps," for it tells not only what cars use Timken Bearings, but exactly where in each car they are used.

If They Cannot Believe in Us, Wi Believe in Our Christ?

Epworth League Topic. II Sam. Matt. 26 : 69–73; I Peter 3 : 1; Acts

THE question almost answers itself said, "Ye are my witnesses." often that a case is stronger t evidence. If we fail to bear a true wit very failure is sure to weaken the some one who is looking toward Christ

How are we to secure that faith in o which will commend to others the fait Christ which we profess? We must true in our statements, true in our frie true in our business, and true in ou tions. We must be kind, we must be g willing to forgive a fault and to believ good intentions of others, and we mus self-seeking. We must be ready to g ask no return and to serve even whe is no apparent appreciation. We r ready to be sacrificed on the altar understanding or false accusation, must love all for whom Christ died fervor that never falters. If in our weakness we are at fault, we must be r acknowledge the fault and to make therefor. Perhaps, after all, we can up by saying that if we would hav believe in our Christ who observe o we must be Christlike.

And if we fail, if we prove false as if we seek our own advantage unwor we claim consecration that our lives b must not be surprised if we hear some "Why should I be a Christian? I'm as B——. I'm better; I'm honest!" than once an answer like this has stopp seemed to be a promising appeal to that had been closed to the Gospel. as Christians live unworthily the en souls will see that the answer is repeat

How to Be Strong

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Heb. 11 : 32–40; 12 : 1–4

THE periodicals are full of the an ments of men who will show you be strong. One will regulate you another will direct your exercise, still will mold your thought. Yet the met all three are alike in this: that their fi is to get rid of the faults and habits tha for weakness—in terms of religion, to of sin. Sin is the force that breaks o that palsies our moral arm, that mal feigned strength a hollow pretense. fore, to be strong we must be rid of si sin is ingrained in our whole being; it even while we abhor it. How shall rid of sin? How shall our sinful h cleansed? Where is the power that sha us stronger than our sins, that shall n hate them and shall bring us to love an the good? Faith is the power, faith i Christ.

The eleventh chapter of Hebrew telling review of the triumphs of fait physical and moral weakness. It is p sive, and it leads unerringly to the conc the great cloud of witnesses disclos Saviour, "Jesus, the Author and Fini our faith."

When Peter at Lydda brought hea Æneas he declared, "Æneas, Jesus maketh thee whole." And it is relate as Jesus walked along the crowded w Judea, "as many as touched him wer whole." Girls Who Made Good

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

IV. Maisie

MAISIE was, as the popular saying goes, born with a gold spoon in her mouth. The only daughter of ri parents, she was almost idolized from the moment when her great won ring blue eyes first opened on the worl

W n she was a tiny girl, Maisie gave bi iday party, and I, a stranger to the tle hostess, was invited—I have neve quite known why. Maisie, even then lidn't belong exactly in my world. But went to the party, a fairy book clasp l close to my heart over the embidered guimpe of my best white froc It was my birthday gift to Mai .

I s the first guest to arrive, possibly beca e birthday parties were valuable expe ences to me, and I had been ready to g for a long while before the appoind hour. Maisie was not dressed whe arrived, and I sat self-consciously in t great drawing-room. In a childish y I noticed that the velvet carpet was ery thick and soft to step on, and that e great chairs had deep cushions mson silk. But somehow the gns oppressed me, and the lack of cozi ss filled me with a certain awe. m ow, deep in my heart, I wished r own little house with its worn ee Hollow chairs and its cheery e ce.

A then Maisie bounded into the r gold-tinted curls aflutter, great dance. Her dainty little gown illed with real lace, and her white oc ngs were made of fine silk. She eed me in an entirely friendly and or less sophisticated manner, and ove my fairy-tale gift, even though it ok lost in the dim magnificence of he awing-room. And then, after the manner of children, we fell to talking shyly until the other small guests arrived.

That shy little conversation was the beginning of our friendship—an odd little friendship, with much that was pleasant in it. On given afternoons I was allowed to go and play with Maisie at her home; sometimes she came to my home to play with me. Once I remember going for a drive with Maisie and her mother in a stately old victoria through stately old streets to the shopping district where Maisie and I sat for hours, rather proudly, waiting for Maisie's mother to finish buying the glossy satins she had come to purchase.

AND then, suddenly, we grew up. And Maisie was sent to a fashionable finishing school. I saw her only when she was home on her Christmas vacations—in the summer she made trips to Europe and the West under the strict chaperonage of one of the teachers. It took Maisie four years to learn what the school had to teach her, but at the end of that time she came home to make her début, a finished young society lady. She could walk well, and talk well, and pour tea in exactly the right way. She made a charming hostess and a delightful guest. Her hair was dressed in exactly the right way, and her gowns were perfect.

And then Fate, one day, threw Prescott Holmes into Maisie's path. And Maisie opened her wide blue eyes a bit wider, and I noticed that they filled deeply with a great light. And Prescott's eyes glowed back at her with the same light. It was love.

If Prescott was born with a spoon in his mouth it was a lead one. The last of a fine family, he lived in a narrow little room in the city and wrote what he called "pot-boilers." His father had been killed when Prescott was a tiny boy; his mother had died when he was just fourteen; and since that time he had fought for himself in a humorously aggressive way. We who knew him felt that some day he would win his fight.

There were plenty of girls who would have been glad to marry Prescott Holmes and help him make good. But Fate threw him in Maisie's way, and I think they were both sure from that first meeting. Finally he told her that he loved her.

"But," she told me he said, "if you marry me it's good-by to cars, and velvet dresses, and opera, and course dinners. What about it: Are you game?"

Maisie was "game"—but bewildered. She came to me the next day with tears in her eyes and a pathetic break in her voice.

"Mother," she said, "is home—crying. Father is wrathy, but he says he'll start Prescott in business—if necessary. Prescott says I've got to live on his income, or else we can't get married. What shall I do?"

"Maisie," I questioned, "do you love Prescott Holmes?"

Maisie looked at me marvelously with the tears drying on her cheeks—

"More than—anything!" said Maisie.

"Then," I answered, "you'd better learn to sweep, and sew, and cook."

"What will mother say?" murmured Maisie.

"Ask her," I suggested.

MAISIE did ask her. And her mother didn't object, though she wasn't enthusiastic. "For," said Maisie's mother, "I had other plans for my daughter!" So Maisie went to cooking school, and dressmaking classes. She had spent four years learning to keep her hands white, and to enter a room gracefully; but in four months she learned to forget about her hands (they were a bit stained from peeling potatoes), and she could sweep a room efficiently, and make a bed without wrinkles.

Well, they were married, Maisie and Prescott Holmes. And as I stood in the simply decorated drawing-room of Maisie's home, (she had insisted on the simplicity. "You see," she told us, "it isn't as if I'm going to be rich") I couldn't help remembering the first party I attended in that same room so many years before.

SOME people don't agree with me when I speak of Maisie as a girl who has made good. Her mother is among the number. Some people are inclined to shrug their shoulders and say, "She had the makings of a beautiful woman, and she might have married a man with a great deal of money and a wonderful social position. She might have had a home on Fifth Avenue and another one at Newport if she hadn't fallen in love with Prescott Holmes."

Perhaps they are right, and I'm wrong. But I met Maisie on the street the other day, with her tiny son in a white enameled go-cart, and she looked mighty beautiful to me. I've seen many women with homes on Fifth Avenue who didn't look nearly so beautiful. Maisie looked happy, too. Many women with villas at Newport don't look happy.

"My dear," she cried out when she saw me, "what do you think? I made jelly this morning, and Prescott's writing a book, and baby has a new tooth! I'm so full of joy that I want to smile at every one in the world."

Maybe Maisie hasn't made good, after all. But—what do you think?

A Real "Fountain of Youth" for Fine Furniture and Floors

Is your good furniture showing signs of use and age? Restore the beauty of newness with 3-in-One Oil. Put a few drops of 3-in-One on a cloth wrung out in cold water. Go over every piece in library, living-room, dining-room and bed-rooms—not forgetting the mahogany case of the piano. Dry and polish with a soft cloth, following the grain of the wood. The results will surprise and delight you. Brighten up desks and other office furniture in the same way.

Your floors, too, need regular treatment with 3-in-One. Make your own polish mop. Cut off any mop 4 inches from the handle and pour on a little 3-in-One Oil. This polish mop will take up all the lint and dust and make your floors look fine.

3-in-One Oil is sold at all stores in 10c, 25c and 50c bottles, also in 25c Handy Oil Cans. The 50c bottle is extra economical, containing ½ pint.

The War in Europe

British unsuccessfully attacked the German lines.

The deadlock of the past few days continued on Wednesday, although there was very hard and determined fighting at several points. The principal attack made by the Allies was on the northeastern portion of their front, north of the Somme, from Le Sars to Rancourt, around Gueudecourt. At the eastern end of the British portion of the front the fighting was the severest, coming to hand-to-hand struggles, but ultimately the assailants were repulsed by the Germans. Hard fighting also took place with the French around Morval and Rancourt, and they managed to penetrate the German positions at Sailly, though elsewhere they were not successful.

On the extreme northwestern end of the line the British made an attempt to advance north of Thiepval, but did not gain any ground, and a similar fate attended a French effort near Bouchavesnes, south of Rancourt. Nothing of importance took place south of the Somme River.

The French the following two days succeeded in driving the Germans out of the village of Sailly and in installing themselves therein, this being the only real advance that was made during the week.

The Cunarder Alaunia, 8,000 tons, said to be carrying 10.000 tons of munitions, was sunk in the British Channel by a mine late in the week. Her passengers are reported to have left her at Falmouth, on the south coast of England, before this mishap took place, and hence there was little loss of life.

Since the king of Rumania in the middle of the week appealed to the Allies, several measures of relief were announced. In the first place the French are sending a military mission composed of more or less distinguished officers to correct the faults in the Rumanian strategy and tactics. Several such missions have been sent by the French heretofore to various distressed partners, notably the one to Russia headed by General Pau. Secondly, the Russians are to send the Rumanians large reinforcements. This would be important, but as it would appear that Russia is herself short of trained and fully equipped men, with the necessary artillery to support them, it will be well to await the actual arrival of such reinforcements before attaching great weight to this report. Thirdly, King Ferdinand is to take command of the Rumanian armies in person. This may be important, provided King Ferdinand is a great military leader, which remains to be proved. In the meantime, pending the happening of these things, the Rumanians are continuing to retreat, and from their own bulletins it is evident that they have been completely driven out of Transylvania and that the Teutons are at several points actually on Rumanian territory and in process of entering thereon at others.

On the Rumanian northeastern and northern fronts the Rumanian retreat continues. Farther to the west, on the southern slopes of the Vulcan Pass, south of Petroseny, is the only place where the Rumanians have apparently been able to hold their positions. On the Drobudja, the southern front, nothing of importance has taken place.

EVENTS moved very rapidly in Greece during the week. On Monday the Allies recognized the provisional government which Venizelos has set up in Salonica. The same day they added several clauses to their original ultimatum, and as a result thereof the Greek people in Greece are no longer to be allowed to have any arms of any kind, and further, the Greek army in northwestern Greece is to have no more ammunition or supplies forwarded to it.

On Tuesday morning the Allies compelled the Greek government to turn over to them the three warships previously exempted from seizure, and thereafter an ultimatum of very grave character was presented to the Greek government by the representative of the Allies, Admiral du Fournet. At the same time a force of a thousand marines and sailors was landed from the Allied warships to patrol Athens and Piræus.

Immediately upon this landing becoming known the streets of Athens swarmed with thousands of Greeks chanting the Greek anthem and cheering the king "frantically," to use the very expression of the dispatch that London allowed to reach us. Thereafter the crowd attacked the sailors and marines and drove them back, and probably would have gone further had not the Greek minister of war ordered out Greek troops, which formed a cordon around them. Later on, at the command of the king, all demonstrating of any kind was repressed, and we are in the dark as to actual happenings after that, though rumors abound. The press states that the American ambassador was appealed to to secure the preservation of Greece.

On the eastern front there was some hard fighting again west of Lutsk, near Zaturce, where the Russians again made a desperate effort to break the German lines with the usual result. In Galicia there was some fighting to the south of the railroad from Brody to Lemberg, which had no important results. Farther south the Russians made a serious attack northeast of Halicz, but were repulsed with unusually heavy losses.

Where was I going?

I did not know.

I had heard my mother say she had a sister in Massachusetts. I made up my mind then that I would go to her. At that time I had no idea I was different from any normal boy. There had been no means of my knowing that the life I was leading would take me to state's prison or the gallows, unless it was checked. I didn't know there was such a thing as a prison and gallows. But I learned about them soon enough. Then, however, I was just a healthy boy running away to escape a father's uncontrollable temper and desire for whisky. I was on a train of freight cars, and the men knew why I was there. They treated me kindly. But three days of kind treatment on a freight train won't alter a boy's character. Perhaps if I had met men on leaving that freight gang who treated me as they did, this sort of a story would never have been told. But I didn't meet the same sort of men.

I met men and boys who like myself couldn't or wouldn't or didn't recognize the difference between right and wrong. I met men whose business it was to teach young boys to steal and pick pockets just as carefully as your boy is being taught how to become a manly man, and just like your boy I learned my lessons well. I met other men who took these boys, when they had become expert, onto the road to steal and plunder and for other unspeakable purposes.

As I say I learned my lessons well. I was an apt pupil—had begun early. My age was with me, for who would suspect an eleven-year-old boy of being a thief?

I didn't stay long in Kansas City. I don't know why, except that way back somewhere in my head was that wish to go to my mother's sister. I beat my way to St. Louis on the Missouri Pacific. Sometimes I rode in coaches, more often underneath. Sometimes I begged my food, sometimes I stole to procure it, but the point is I always got it. Back door and front door alike yielded all the food I asked. Always my age and story brought the lady of the house across. And each time I told the story I added more sob stuff. Open windows and cellar doors got me all else I needed.

And then the inevitable happened. Why it hadn't happened sooner I can't understand.

Our Bible Picture Contest

WE are now very hopeful of an early decision by the judges. A most interesting phase of the contest ought to be the reexamination of the pictures by every competitor in the light of the judges' decision as to the best answers. Naturally, they are not expected to explain why one of several verses that seem equally applicable is the most so in their opinion; possibly they could not explain their choice in every case by definite points. In fact, the decision in many cases will be a majority vote of the judges where several verses seem to be equally good.

As a result of all this deliberation it can scarcely be doubted that the wisdom of the judges' decision for each of the sixty pictures will be recognized by all competitors. Many and many a competitor will exclaim, "Oh, why didn't I see how much better that verse is than the one I chose!" and we believe this work of comparing with the pictures the answers which you submitted, in the light of the judges' decisions, will be a most interesting and beneficial phase of the contest.

As soon as possible, the decisions will be announced and the awards made.

Whose Victories?

"While debating the liquor problem," said a Helena, Montana, paper, "do not fail to note that for a thousand years the most spirited military victories have been won after serving grog." Whereupon an anti-liquor paper replied: "There is some truth in this, but the victories were not won by those who guzzled the grog but by the other fellow."

Successful Egg Farming

"200 Eggs a Year Per Hen" — How to Get Them

THE eighth edition of the book "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen" is now ready. Revised, enlarged, and in part re-written; 96 pages. Contains among other things the method of feeding by which Mr. S. D. Fox of Wolfboro, N. H., won the prize of $100 in gold offered by the manufacturers of a well-known condition powder for best egg record during the winter months. Simple as a,b,c,—and yet we guarantee it to start hens to laying earlier and to induce them to lay more eggs than any other method under the sun. The book also contains a recipe for egg food and tonic used by Mr. Fox, which brought him in one winter day 68 eggs from 72 hens; and for five days in succession from the same flock 64 eggs a day. Mr. E. F. Chamberlain, of Wolfboro, N. H., says: "By following the methods outlined in your book I obtained 1,496 eggs from 91 R. I. Reds in the month of January, 1902." From 14 pullets picked at random out of a farmer's flock the author got 2,999 eggs in one year—an average of over 214 eggs apiece. It has been my ambition in writing "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen" to make it the standard book on egg production and profits in poultry. Tells all there is to know, and tells it in a plain, common-sense way.

Price 50 cents; or with a year's subscription to AMERICAN POULTRY ADVOCATE, both for 75 cents; two years' subscription and book for $1.00, or given free as a premium for two yearly subscriptions at 50 cents each.

Brown of Lancaster, Pa., but had been neither accepted nor rejected at this writing. It is as follows:

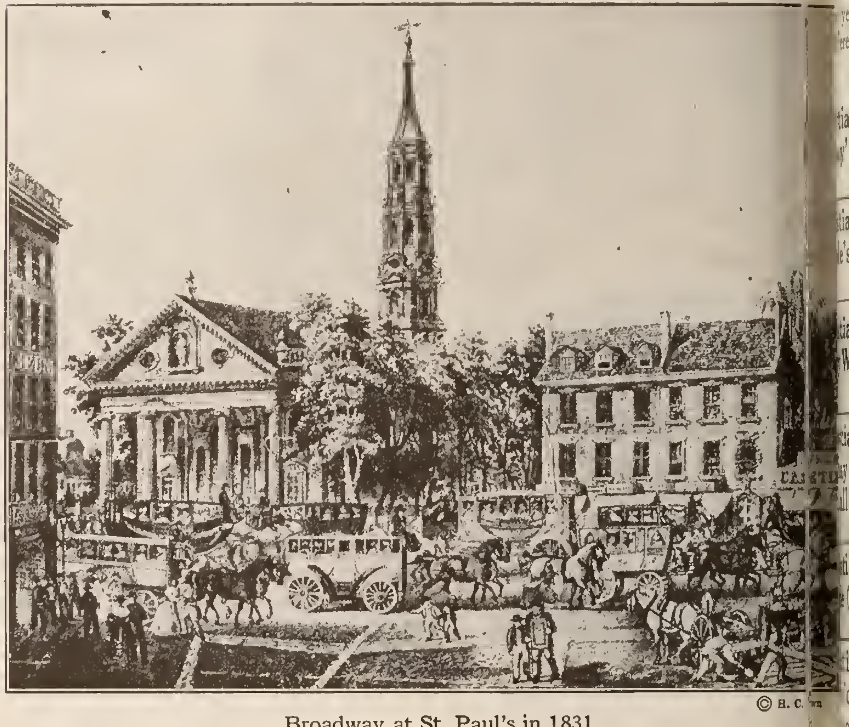
> "O God, who has taught us by Thy blessed Son that we cannot serve both Mammon and Thee, send upon us the anointing fire of Thy unquenchable Spirit, that we may uproot the worship of money which corrupts our land and all the nations of the world. Lay the axe, O God, to the root of the tree which brings forth the corrupt fruit of misery and war. Guide us in the upbuilding of a commonwealth of brothers, wherein service shall be the test of honor and worship; and give us grace to endure martyrdom, if need be, in the preaching of Thy full Gospel, that all men may know the truth which shall set them free to live the life of brothers."

Evidence of the fading of the animosities of '61 was given in the retention of the name "Memorial Day" in the prayer for that anniversary. A suggestion that it be made "a prayer for patriots," in order that it might apply equally to Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee, was met by a statement from a southern delegate that he saw no reason why there should be any change, as the time had come when the brave were honored no matter on which side they had fought. The wording of the prayer makes it suitable for use by either the Blue or the Gray. The House of Bishops on October 18 recommended that the Ten Commandments be printed in the prayer book both in the proposed abridged form and in the usual form. At this time it is impossible to give a more complete report of this most important convention.

Old St. Paul's Still Young

By MARY KENDALL HYDE

THE corner-stone of St. Paul's Chapel, which is now celebrating its 150th anniversary, was laid on a quiet May day in 1764, in a wheat field, so far up-town as to cause severe criticism by many, who pronounced the erection of a church in so out-of-the-way a place to be a sinful waste of money, as the town would by no means ever extend its limits far enough to insure a large or steady attendance. However, the church was built and the dedication services held on October 30, 1766. The steeple was added in 1794, and four years later a clock arrived from London and began its duty as timekeeper.



Broadway at St. Paul's in 1831

© B. C.

In the years when Wall Street was a fashionable promenade where on Sunday afternoon bewigged gentlemen in cocked hats, blue or scarlet coats, embroidered waistcoats, knee-breeches, white silk stockings and silver shoe buckles, accompanied by ladies in gay silks and satins—many riding in sedan-chairs—exchanged pinches of snuff from gold or silver snuff-boxes along with bits of friendly gossip—in those years St. Paul's held many a brilliant assemblage and stately festival. Lord Howe, Sir Guy Carleton, Major André and many soldiers of the king attended service here in pre-revolutionary days.

But now in the days when fortunes instead of pinches of snuff are exchanged on Wall Street, and there is little leisure for friendly gossip, when business has supplanted residence in what has become lower New York, St. Paul's undertakes to minister to business, to serve busy Broadway spiritually at its own convenience. Noon time and midnight are preferably Broadway's convenient hours. For twenty years during the noon hour short religious services have attracted thousands. Special services are held during Lent and on feast days; during the last Holy Week nearly 6,000 persons attended. The famous noonday musical services were attended by more than 10,000 persons during the winter and spring. The organ which came from England in 1803 and was enlarged in 1864 is still in use, and many notable organists render their own compositions at the ancient instrument during the festival services. The churchyard is always open, and provides benches and seats for rest. Many young business women employed in nearby offices spend their noon hours in the hospitable grounds when the weather permits.

"The usefulness of St. Paul's is far from being at an end," says the Rev. Dr. William Montague Geer, vicar for the past twenty-eight years. "While the location makes ordinary parochial work on a large scale no longer possible, Old St. Paul's is a veritable shrine, in no sense emptied of its former spiritual value, in no sense preserved solely on account of its interesting history. Its doors are ever open for prayer and worship. It seeks through many agencies to give spiritual and practical help to those who labor in this region. It is today one of the most important centers of work for our Lord and his church in this city. In a neighborhood occupied in money-making, it bears unceasing testimony to a merchandise that is better than the merchandise of silver and the gain thereof than fine gold. Located near the courts of this great city it represents the Highest Court, the Judgment Seat of Jesus Christ, before which the decisions of all earthly tribunals shall be reviewed.

"Through these long years, and under all changing conditions, St. Paul's Chapel has ministered to the people in holy things, in a spirit of loyalty to Jesus Christ, the Great Head of the Church and the Saviour of the world."

A luxurious limousine or open touring car

This Touring Sedan is the "most practical automobile ever built." One minute it is a powerful, speedy Haynes touring car with the permanent top in place. Next minute it is a luxurious, perfectly appointed Haynes limousine of which you'll be proud in any company. The transformation from touring car to sedan, or from closed car to open, takes less time than it requires to tell about it. The windows are removable and quickly concealed in special pockets in the sides of the body.

"America's Greatest 'Light Six'"

HAYNES

"America's Greatest 'Light Twelve'"

No matter how cold or stormy the weather, you will ride snugly protected in the Haynes Sedan, comfortably heated and ventilated. The divided front seats provide one large space, giving a comfortable sense of roominess and cosiness.

No matter what the road conditions, there is power and responsiveness in America's Greatest "Light Six" and "Light Twelve" motors to master them easily. It will pull you through mud or snow so deep that the running boards drag.

Consult your Haynes dealer now, and see this Touring Sedan that gives two cars for the price of one.

Get ready to enjoy fall and winter motoring—the keenest of outdoor sports. Compare with cars of much higher price—for appearance, comfort, power, performance—and you'll choose Haynes.

Don't miss the months when there's more tonic in the air than at any other season of the year. If you order quickly you can get your Haynes Touring Sedan for prompt delivery.

Every new Haynes production is quickly oversold —see your dealer now and have your Haynes Touring Sedan ready when you want it

The Story of a Wonderful Life

WHEN a man begins to realize that life is meant for service to others, that wealth is not a possession but a stewardship, and that what the world often counts for success may be disappointment and failure, unless these ideals have been kept steadily in view—when he realizes these things, and orders his life accordingly, he has found his true career.

In the biography of Joseph Fels, written with the intimate knowledge of one who knew him best, we trace step by step the development of a career which in many ways might serve as an inspiration and a model for the business men of America. In these days of intense devotion to money-getting, it is seldom that we have to take note of a life record in which earnestness and efficiency are so combined with high purpose and a clear vision of duty as this little volume describes.

It is the story of a youth of humble origin and comparatively few early advantages, who began business life at fifteen. But Joseph Fels had in him the qualities by which men climb to business success. He schemed, planned and toiled assiduously, mastering even the minutest details, and while still a young man in the early twenties he found himself at the head of a business which his skilful management developed to enormous proportions. Most men in such a position would have been dazzled by the rich revenues it yielded, revenues which increased with every year; but the successful young manufacturer was of different stuff. He began to think new thoughts, to dream new dreams, and to work toward their realization.

THIS was the real turning-point in a life which was destined to count for much in the big business world in which he moved. He met all classes, the rich and the poor, and involuntarily he became a philanthropist, constantly helping others. There were many who, coming in contact with him at this stage of his career, were inspired and helped to better manhood.

Mr. Fels's efforts in behalf of social and economic reform began in 1895. Into each new enterprise he carried the same quickness of intellectual discernment and thoroughness that had made him so remarkably successful in the business world. But now he worked not for gain, but with an intense desire to benefit his fellow men, to save them from exploitation, to provide land for the landless, better homes for the toilers, more sanitary surroundings for the poor, to stimulate thrift and prosperity.

His efforts in philanthropic reform extended to England, where in 1901 he studied land and labor conditions, farm and home colonies, and the great problem of unemployment. There he formed the acquaintance of many of the leaders, in and out of Parliament, who were striving to ameliorate the condition of labor, both urban and rural; and as he gave them valuable aid in fighting their battles, they learned to love the quiet American and to appreciate his wise counsel. On his return to America he devoted himself to his beloved work of philanthropic reform with greater zeal than ever. He was an ardent single-taxer. Land hunger he held to be at the root of a great part of the world's poverty and discontent, and he showed the sincerity of his convictions by establishing the Joseph Fels Fund Commission, endowing it at the outset with one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars for a five years' educational propaganda, which was remarkably successful.

Long before these events, however, Mr. Fels had taken a step which, viewed in the light of his great business success, must be regarded as an extraordinary one. He had cut loose from all further accumulation of riches; he had abandoned mere money-making, that he might devote himself wholly to philanthropic reform, which he felt to be his real life-work. He differed from certain other well-known philanthropists in motive as well as method. This he explained in a letter in which he said that while he appreciated the work of others, he could not believe that the greatest need of the work-peo

Libby's Fruit Desserts

Libby's luscious California fruits and golden Hawaiian Pineapple are distinguished by the exquisite taste and rich color found only in fully sun-ripened fruit, because Libby's fruits are picked the moment they reach perfection—not before—and prepared the same day.

Pineapple Surprise

Cut one can of Libby's Sliced Hawaiian Pineapple into small pieces; cut a stale sponge cake into slices and soak each slice in the pineapple syrup. Put alternate layers of the pineapple and the cake into a wet ring mold, and fill it up with lemon or wine jelly. Put in the refrigerator or a cool place to set. When quite firm, dip the mold into a bowl of tepid water, and turn it out on the serving dish. Decorate with whipped and sweetened cream and half slices of pineapple. Send to table with some more cream served separately.

Marion Harris Neil

Pears in Rice Border

Drain one can of Libby's Pears. Pour four cupfuls of milk into a saucepan, add six tablespoonfuls of sugar and grated rind of one lemon, bring to boil, sprinkle in one cupful of rice, and cook slowly until it is tender, and has absorbed the milk. When done, turn it into a bowl to cool, add three-fourths cupful of whipped cream, and one and one-half tablespoonfuls of powdered gelatine dissolved in one-half cupful of the pear liquor. Pour into a wet ring mold and turn out when firm. Place the pears in the center and serve decorated with whipped cream and a few blanched almonds.

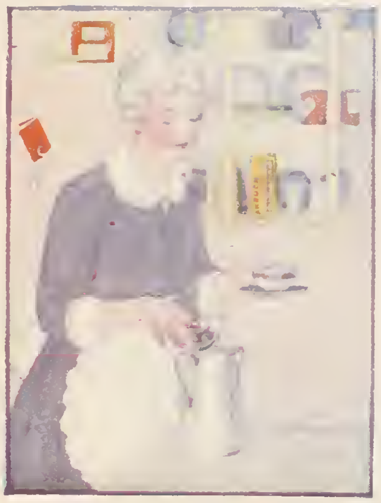
HOW TO MAKE COFFEE

By the greatest coffee merchants in the world

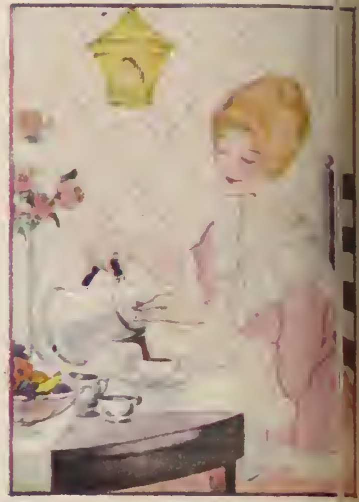
With pictures of three wives and what their husbands say of their coffee

There has been a great deal written and said about making coffee, and wherever you go, each woman thinks her way is best. Yet we all know how much coffee varies; good one meal—bad the next—often so bad you simply can't drink it.

Don't be discouraged if you are not getting coffee as fine as you would like to have. Don't be satisfied to drink coffee which is "just medium." A million other women make coffee their husbands b about, and it is so easy for you to do it. Instead of coffee which u only put up with because you can't get the kind you would like to have, you can get coffee which every member of your family will enjoy, coffee which every visitor will praise, coffee which you yourself couldn't do without.



Mrs. Jones boils her coffee



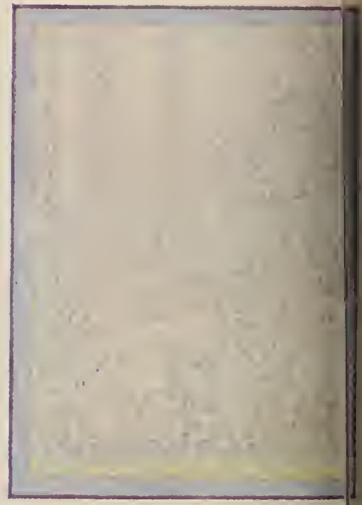
Mrs. Green never uses anything but a percolator

How to make Boiled Coffee: the way most people make coffee: Be sure that the pot is clean. Have your coffee ground medium fine, just the size Arbuckles' Ground Coffee is. Allow one heaping tablespoonful to each cup of water, with one extra spoonful of coffee for the pot. Put the coffee into the pot, add cold water; then bring to a boil. Let boil until it is just the strength you like. Settle with a dash of cold water. If you like your coffee very strong, make it this way. By starting with cold water and bringing it to a boil, you get the full strength from the coffee.

The Drip Method, the simplest way: Have your coffee ground very fine, almost to a powder. Use only half a tablespoonful to a cup, with an extra one for the pot. (This method requires only half as much coffee as used for other methods.) Put the coffee in a piece of clean cheese cloth; pour boiling water through it slowly—through once only. Be sure to have water boiling. If you like your coffee milder—not so strong—make it this way. Remember, this does not make coffee as strong as boiled coffee—if you want it stronger, don't make it this way, because increasing the amount of coffee used won't make it any stronger.

Percolator Coffee—the surest method: Use a medium fine ground coffee for percolators (just the size Arbuckles' Ground Coffee is). Allow a tablespoonful to each cup of coffee and one extra; let the water percolate up through the coffee until the coffee is just the right strength. Test it by letting a little run into a cup. Making coffee this way, you can have it just as mild or just as strong as you like, and you can rely on its being good every time.

Mrs. Smith makes drip coffee



No. 278. Nottingham Lace Curtains Each curtain a yard wide and two-and-three-quarters yards long.

One woman writes us: "I have had pair of your beautiful curtains ten year and they are still good."

54 signatures and 2c stamp, or 60c an 25 signatures.

To get these results, the coffee itself must be right and must always be the same

Things you should watch out for

The coffee itself: There are hundreds of varieties of coffee grown. The coffee itself must be put up by men who know coffee! Arbuckles' Coffee is. It is put up by Arbuckle Bros., the greatest coffee merchants in the world. They can give you the value in coffee which no one else can afford to give.

At an honest price: Coffee is the easiest thing in the world to cheat people on. Arbuckles' Coffee is an honest coffee at an honest price. It is pure coffee, of a fine quality. There is more of it sold than any other coffee—that is why they can afford to give you the biggest value for your money.

Clean and fresh: No matter how good coffee itself is, if it isn't well taken care of, it makes a poor drink. Arbuckles' Coffee is put up in sealed, dust-proof packages, carefully wrapped to protect it from moisture, dirt, store odors. It arrives in your kitchen strong, full of flavor.

Always the same: Arbuckles' Coffee today is the biggest selling coffee in the United States. Did you ever stop to think what this means? To think how good a coffee must be to be the biggest seller in the United States? From the moment it was put on the market, it was a success. Today, it is used in over a million homes in the United States.

Beautiful gifts: We share our profits with you by giving you useful and beautiful premiums for signatures saved from the Arbuckles' Coffee packages. We buy premiums for over a million users of Arbuckles' Coffee. Buying in such large quantities makes it possible for us to give the greatest premium values ever seen. In every package of Arbuckles' Coffee, there is a circular showing pictures of our premiums. Be sure to see it and see for yourself how quickly and easily you can get what you want, all without any cost.

"Kam'rate"

A True Story of the Great War

By HEDGAR PLUVIANNES

HE battle was over. Cannons and guns rested. One could only hear the groaning of the wounded, the death-rattle of the dying.

The winter twilight fell and enveloped the y field in its icy veil.

brancardiers, too few, alas! hastened to carry their last hand-barrows in this sad evening's un- n glow. Then, the absolute silence, torn some- by a plaint or a great sigh . . . the final plaint, preme sigh.

e stars had shone for many hours when a sol- stretched on the ground, raised himself on his and looked around him. Gradually his mind covering its lucidity.

remembered suddenly everything. He was in ar. A shell passing near him had just thrown n the ground unconscious. In trying to rise he d he was not even wounded. But, still dizzy his fall and fainting fit, he did not recognize his and hardly knew on which side to go to join the h lines.

last he decided to walk. The cool night air re- him, and his soul went up to God in an outburst titude. Then his thoughts came down again.

"ly wife! my little children!" he whispered. "I sha perhaps see them again!"

marched on at random, glad to leave behind him he field of death and horror. In a tree a night- ir sadly moaned.

en he stopped abruptly. He had heard a voice g:

"ho goes there?"

was a German sentinel!

lybaud, the French soldier, was so near that he id ot even answer, and just lifted up his hands. He a t once seized by two men and made prisoner.

the post his examination confirmed his pale, ard appearance, his uniform stained with the ble of the brave men who had died beside him. He wa undeniably a lost soldier, fallen in the German lin without any premeditation of spying.

e officer called a man, armed with a revolver.

"ake this prisoner to the camp," he said. "Later will join the others."

e French soldier said nothing. This stupid adven- tu when he thought himself safe, discouraged him.

the uncanny light of the lantern, he looked up to e German who was to lead him. The latter was t man, about forty, curiously thin for a Prussian, an impenetrable and stiff attitude and blue eyes ik porcelain.

"o on," he said sharply, "and remember, I don't tol te bad behavior!"

ived on the border of the wood, the German sol- die shouted again, roughly, so that the officer might hea him:

"ot so fast, please! We have plenty of time! Ke straight!"

t once in the thicker shade of the forest, he slack- en his pace and led the way slowly on the right in- ste of the left, where the German fires burned ee. After a few minutes of walk in silence, he lig y touched his companion's arm.

e Frenchman turned. He was ready to die. In this dark wood, disarmed, alone with an armed Prussian, it was the shortest way. He even preferred it to imprisonment. He knew all about it. And he did not doubt a minute that his turn had come.

The night was too somber for them to see each other, even indistinctly, but Reybaud had an impression of relief. His enemy's hand had no brutal touch.

"Kam'rate," whispered the German, "haf you some children?"

"Yes," said the other, in a strangled voice, "I have three small ones."

"And I haf seven. Well, you may run away. The French lines are this way."

And he pushed him in the right direction.

The French soldier, in the deep darkness, felt for the "Boche's" hand and gripped it heartily.

"Camarade," he said, "I thank you," and with a jump, he disappeared.

IN the morning he had joined his company, where his story was hardly believed. However, by the evening, around the fire, when the soup was boiling, he succeeded (after having put in it the necessary time and eloquence) in persuading his comrades.

"He deserves that we should meet him again, that Boche," said a poilu. "He would realize the French are ever grateful for a good turn. I, for one, would hand him some chocolate in his trench, if it could be done."

"And I some cigarettes," said another.

"And I some good white bread from home."

The rescapé smiled a little ironically.

"That would hardly pay for my precious skin," he said. "But war has its surprises. . . . The opportunity may come."

He felt a sort of vague tenderness, besides gratitude, for that man whom he had unconsciously hated the day before without even knowing him, and who had given back to him his liberty.

This German had a heart in which had come down from heaven some of the great, infinite Pity.

A FEW brief days of rest, then the return to the first lines.

Some very sharp battles had taken place on a steep slope of which the Germans held the crest and consequently the best part. The French assault was terrific and successful. In the evening, when the hill was conquered and the slope covered with the dead and wounded, the Germans had to leave theirs behind. And there friends and enemies lay together, under the still sky where the stars shone on the useless and cruel folly of men.

THIS time, the rescapé had held on, until the end of the struggle. A thousand bullets had hissed in his ears, but none had touched him. In the midst of this horrible furnace, he had, as a living miracle, kept safe and calm.

Now, he helped the brancardiers, again too few for their harassing task of carrying the wounded. They took first the most seriously wounded, but these were so numerous that the hand-barrows did not suffice.

Everywhere hemorrhages claimed immediate and careful attendance.

The night was getting deeper and some snowflakes whirled in the air.

"Mein Gott!" whispered a voice near Reybaud.

He bent over the German soldier, who was losing a large quantity of blood through a terrible wound.

The Frenchman had with him everything for a first dressing. While he was doing it, the other opened his eyes and looked at him keenly. They were the eyes of the kind Boche who had set him free! . . .

THE hand that held the sterilized cotton shook slightly, but only for a second. Reybaud passed his arm under the poor bloody head and whispered:

"Camarade it is I."

The German tried a feeble smile.

"I haf known you at once," he said.

"How lucky!" said Reybaud. "Well, let me stop that blood quickly with this pad; then I will call a brancardier."

The German soldier had a look half frightened, half surprised.

"I heard, that—that—you finished the wounded."

The Frenchman laughed, shrugging his shoulders.

"Of course, we do—we finish—to cure them, if we can! You will see, old fellow."

But, when he wanted a brancardier, none was in view. The night was perfectly dark and the wounded moaned with cruel pain.

"By Jove!" said Reybaud, as he scratched his right ear, "I am in a fine mess! Still, I can't possibly let my Boche die here without help!"

Fortunately the wound had stopped bleeding,

Reybaud took him in his arms like a child.

"Pass your arm around my neck. Don't move, and make no fuss. Happily you are as thin as a stick! Not like most of your fellow soldiers!"

Ah! the hard walk! Reybaud could never forget it: one long mile and a half during which "his Boche" fainted three or four times and was very heavy, in spite of his thinness.

At last he arrives, spent, after many halts, but having been so careful that the bandage is not even disarranged.

"It looks as if this Boche is something special to you," said the infirmier, with a suspicious air.

"Very special, indeed," coolly answers Reybaud, laying down his burden on the first bed he finds. "And please, take special care of him. I want him to see his seven children again, if possible. Without him, I would be now in Germany as prisoner, which is, as you know, not a fate to be envied."

"That's very strange," said the infirmier.

"Very strange things happen nowadays, but they are true all the same," said the soldier, sitting down to breathe.

REYBAUD has fallen on the battlefield. The German soldier is patiently waiting for Peace and will see his seven children again. They will talk about the days when, above the iron barriers of hatred raised by the pride and ambition of men, two soldiers had heard the Christ-Voice and practiced the supreme Law of Love and Charity.

Through the Orient for the Christian Herald

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—FIFTH LETTER

Well, I declare! if there aren't those strange Americans staring at us folks again!

To Sacred Fuji and Asama's Crater

THE ascent of Fuji-yama, or Fuji-san as the natives call it, is an experience never to be forgotten. Never to have climbed the peerless peak is never to have lived. Though my ascent of the extinct volcano took place last year, I shall never duplicate my experience of that time.

Well, back we go to Fuji, stopping at the semi-foreign hotel at Subashiri in search of food, straw sandals, a climbing-staff and a guide. My Japanese amounts to "Thank you" and "How much is it?" and I am at the mercy of the people, even though the wan remains of a missionary salary are curling up in my pocket, prior to absolute extinction.

Down comes a polite Japanese to see how he can do the foreigner. Japanese food will be seventy-five cents for none too fine a meal. Very good: one must eat, even if the hotel-keeper is a born robber. Our shoes are our only pair and must be protected from the cinders. How much for straw sandals, worth two and one-half cents a pair? Ten cents. Well, that is high, but one must pay for the blessing of being an American in Japan. How much for the climbing-staff, regular price ten cents? "Sixty sen," two sen being equal to one cent, as a yen of one hundred sen is worth fifty cents. I was going to be skinned alive, but why kick? Travel is always expensive.

The Turning of the Worm

BUT when it came to the matter of a guide, the worm turned. The charge for a guide is one yen and a half a day. It was seven o'clock in the evening and I expected to return the following noon. The guide is supposed to carry food and bedding, as well as to show the way through the darkness of the night. I was to carry no food, nor did I have any bedding. A coat and a light camera were all that guide would have to carry to the top. Yet I was told that the charge would be three yen.

That was too much. It was more than I had. I asked why the charge was double.

"It is for two days."

My small supply of pidgin English sprang to the fore.

"How catchee two days? Me start tonight for top-side and come bottom-side tomorrow."

"Today is today, until midnight. Tomorrow is tomorrow. Today and tomorrow, two days, three yen."

I looked that heathen Jap square in the eye and my American got the better of my English.

"You charge two prices to the foreigners and think it pays. I won't eat your food, wear your sandals, carry your staff or hire your guide. Right now I start for the top, all alone and with an empty stomach. Sayonara; good night."

TEN minutes after I had delivered my ultimatum to the hotel-keeper, I wished I had not been so rash. Night had come down in earnest. I could not ask the way, except in English, and the paths led here and there through the shadowy woods. But I kept on upward. It was the luckiest hit of my travels. After walking about a mile, I came upon four hundred soldiers, who were making a practice march to the top.

If I had known they were going and had applied for permission to accompany them, official red tape would have engulfed me until the next day. But happening on them as I did, I simply "fell in" and contiuued on my way with the largest body-guard any man ever had for such a trip.

Makes all the difference in the world which direction you are going here

Two of the officers spoke English — a little. One spoke French very badly, like myself. But they had some crackers and I had some caramels and we got on famously.

For two hours we tramped onward in the deep cinder roadway, now lost in deep woods and now stepping aside to let a giant horse with an enormous rider emerge from the darkness above us, and pass on to the village below.

An Ascent by Moonlight

Then the moon came out. Oh, that moon! Three nights ago I sat in my balcony at Nikko for hours and watched the clouds scurry across the bright face of the man in the moon. Two nights ago I sat beneath the great torii at Lake Chuzenji and saw that oon sparkle the lake top with strings of brilliant rls. But never did the moon seem so fine as it did th last night in July, as we toiled upward through the res on the slopes of glorious Fuji.

I kept a place at the very rear of the march, a the paths zig-zagged above. The scene was mas l in blacks and whites, with the "soot and white sh" effect that one sees in shadowy places when the oon is full. The marching column moved in and t of the moonlight, in kaleidoscopic change but r ular formation.

In place of guns they carried walking staves. hey kept in perfect step as they advanced on the c tan summit, which could now and then be seen in a pac between the dense foliage of the lofty trees. I and out of the light marched these fine lines of so erly men. With each step those white staves swung the light. The meu seemed to be dressed in white, d a mile after mile passed I imagined I was a fo we with Hannibal in his long drive at Italy throu he uorthern barriers, or that, with Cæsar, we were n ving on to some mighty battle.

I have seen moving pictures of panic and fire nes and have felt the fear of the people and the sc h o the red-tongued fire; but never have I felt a epe thrill of sympathetic movement than I did te o'clock that night on Fuji's side. There was som hing real and earnest in that panting but regular ard up Fuji that has impressed me ever since. ood guide, straw sandals—avaunt!

I was sorry that I had not purchased a staff No that I needed it, but that in not swinging m staf in unison with that fine group of fighting men fel as though I were unarmed in a general advance

We kept at it all night, resting for brief peri s t accustom our hearts and lungs to the rarer a fo Fuji is more than twelve thousand feet high, a ou start was from a point only two thousand feet bov sea-level. Before midnight we had left the tre and small shrubs behind and were climbing the bar ide of the volcanic cone.

Dawn on the Volcano's Summit

AT three o'clock a slight glow could be discer d i the east, to balance the clear light of the hoo above us. We were then at the eighth of ten st ons and the summit seemed very near. As I wanted t get picture of the sunrise from the top, I left my f nds the soldiers, and started ahead while they res l. thought I could make the top in ten minut bu when the sun rose a little before four I was stil om distance from the crater.

Small clouds had formed in the valleys, veili th tiny lakes, whose silver surfaces we had seen n and then as we climbed, and when the red ball fir finally appeared, the clouds resembled a va sea with lesser peaks forming islands in the broad e ans of billowy softness.

At each of .the ten rest stations I had stop d t have my fan marked. I bought a fan in plac of staff, as I thought it would be more easily car d i a suit case. Pilgrims have their staves mar d to show that they have made the pilgrimage to t top and some men are careful enough to have their ack stamped with the date and the point to whic they climbed. The staff is branded by fire at the to also and one must wait his turn with hundreds of p rim who have gathered here from the remotest p s o the empire. There were more than three th sanc

If American farmers would irrigate their fields in the way this Japanese irr tes his rice crop, they might keep their boys interested p ple at the top of Fuji the morning I was there, se n hundred of them being soldiers. Three hundred h marched up that night from Gotemba.

here is a weather station at the top, so that people ca be warned of storms or cloudy weather. It had ra ed for three days before I started up, and by noon o he day I was there it had become cl dy, and stayed that way for four days. I ve been told of one party of foreigners w returned to Yokohama after six da ' vain attempt to climb Fuji in fair w her!

here is also a post office at the top, w nce letters and telegrams can be sent to y spot in the civilized world.

descended to Gotemba down the ei er slope, in which there are no large st es. One descends here in great leaps of veral yards each, bounding from one fo to the other and going down at a te fic rate. On my way I met an old m , almost ninety years old, who was cl bing to the top, one station at a time ar with one day at the top, thus making a ree weeks' pilgrimage to conquer the or peak. He would not let his guide to h him or assist him, even on the ro hest path. Behind him I passed a fa red-faced, saké-drinking man of three hu lred pounds or so, being dragged up th mountain by two sturdy guides. w se sinewy legs were a great contrast w the ankleless tree trunks that se d him as limbs.

reached the base of the mountain in go time and was foolish enough to walk ac ss the level plain to Gotemba. I could have ri n for fifty cents, but I was too poor and too pr d to do that when I could walk all the way. W n I reached the hotel my trip up and back had co me thirty-four cents, most of which went for po l cards and postage from the top, but some of w h I had spent for eggs, which I obtained by m ng a shape like an egg with my fingers and ca ling. Thank goodness, there are some universal la ages without waiting for Esperanto!

bath in a basin and a lunch in my stocking feet, si ng cross-legged in a paper room, finished the ex rience, and I caught the same train out on which I d entered twenty-four hours before. I was hot, an a little tired.

A Scene That Thrilled on Asama-Yama

T HE trip up Asama-yama, the active volcano in central Japan, was not as unusual, nor was it as be tiful. Twelve missionaries rode to the base of the m ntain before climbing to the eight-thousand-foot su nit. Four started to walk all the way, and two of th rode back from the base. Two of us walked the wh e twenty-six miles—ten of which is steep climbing u r down—in fourteen hours from Karuizawa back to at delightful resort. We started in the rain at se n-thirty at night and had no moon. Our only lig on that steep ascent was furnished by the Ja nese lanterns which made our strung-out party lo like a lengthy grave-robbing expedition.

here was one thrill on the trip that I shall never fo t. As we reached the summit, the crater was fil with dense smoke and steam. But as we stood th , gazing down into the bowels of the earth, a br e carried the smoke to one side and a horrid deep re ash appeared, which widened rapidly. The whole m en mass seemed to rise, and instinctively we all st ed back and I reached for m camera. The cracks criss-cr ed here and there in the cr r, and the sea of fire seemed to bble and toss with the heat, li a hall-bedroomite during a ho wave.

hen I got back to Karui-za , some one asked whether th mass rose up toward the r till it felt hot to our faces. I looked that man straight in e eye and with the honesty comes from the knowledge th fifteen other witnesses wo d corroborate or deny my wo s I told him that it did not, bu hat it did all the spectacular st s I could stand.

ama-yama still erupts now an then, and a few years ago a sionary was killed by flying la But I, for one, was mighty th kful that the great volcano w hot in a boastful mood as I st l on its yawning brim like a lpless pigmy and looked wi awe on that ugly red crack wh h looked like a smoking de n-wound in the side of M er Earth. There are some th s that I fear, and one of th is death by burning. I can loo down into a volcano once an be glad to do it, but I am no ne of those who would like on or a plaything. I'd rather sn with Nature than be familiar with her and have her spit molten stone in my face.

Speaking of Factories

AN interesting thing that I noted on my visit to the Nipponophone factory (mentioned in my letter of a week ago) was the advertising, which takes cognizance of every big item of news, and especially of every season, so that a striking advertisement is immediately sent out to all the dealers. The trade-mark for this Oriental edition of "His Master's Voice" is a leaning Buddha, with hand to ear, listening to the entrancing strains of the Nipponophone. Yesterday, as I passed down the street, I heard Sousa's "El Capitan" being played, and there is the remote possibility that if a modern dance were introduced, old Buddha would do the fox trot or the one step. At present he is only hesitating.

Fuji as seen from Matosu Lake

It may seem sacrilegious to refer thus to the placid image that has for centuries stood for contemplation and repose; but the Japanese Buddhists have taken to this use of their god quite eagerly, and if they feel that way about a national idol, I don't see why I should talk with bated breath. The Nipponophone gives promise of making Buddha into a trade-mark and a joke. The Billiken is also used as a trade-mark, and the Japanese have it that he and Buddha are married!

A Factory Worth While

TWO days later, armed with the proper introductions, we visited the fine works of the Tokyo Electric Company, which is a Japanese firm connected with the General Electric Company. There is a factory that is a factory! Grinnell automatic sprinklers, automatic fire doors, a 59-hour week with Sundays free, a sewage disposal plant, a hospital, a restaurant, a full hour nooning, athletic and play fields for men and girls, a fire department with the best equipment, and forced ventilation, make this the model factory of Japan.

The Mazda lamp is so common in the Far East that it was not till I reached America last year that I noticed many old carbon lamps. In the East, economy is such a necessity that the people cannot afford the common lamps, and the proportion of Mazda globes to the old style current wasters is at least as great as it is in the United States.

It is a sight worth going miles to see neatly dressed girls do the delicate work of fusing in the wires and winding them, with an absence of lost motions which comes from careful instruction under the latest methods of scientific management. Men slide back and forth in front of the vacuum pumps, sealing the bulbs and sending them off on miniature railways to the next operation. It is just like an American factory, the only difference being in the bright kimonos and obis of the girls and the slant eyes of the men. I need not describe the steps in the work. But there is the wonderful fact that cheap labor can produce a bulb that will give as much candle-power, use as little current and last as many hours as the American product.

Japanese products, on the whole, are so shoddy that trade associations in Japan have had to fine their members for poor work, and many complaints come in to show that unless Nippon changes her methods, her developing industrial life will be wrecked by its own dishonesty. But the Tokyo Electric Company factory is proving the value of short hours, a Sunday of rest, and welfare work for its employees.

The newly enacted labor and factory law does not affect the Mazda factory in the least, as they have anticipated the much-needed reforms by several years. Of the more than two thousand workers engaged, all are working under good light and air conditions and are given abundant time for rest and recreation. They do more and better work than laborers in other factories, and this Japanese firm, in which an American is succeeding in having the latest manufacturing methods and welfare work introduced, is attracting the attention of many Japanese manufacturers, who are facing the need for "speeding up," but who cannot get more work out of their long-houred schedule.

A Look Ahead

THERE are three or four very especial things that Mr. Maynard Owen Williams will do for the Christian Herald in the Orient, and one of these is to visit several of the orphanages in China supported in part by the readers of this paper. Mr. Williams is still in Japan and has had some most important interviews with leaders of Japanese thought and action, and a continuous treat of informative and entertaining articles is ahead. But to the many readers who have entered into the joy of redeeming cast-out Chinese orphan children from unspeakable careers of shame and misery to become Christian men and women carrying in their lives and on their lips the message of Christ to their fellows, what Mr. Williams will be able to tell about them will be peculiarly welcome.

This work began with a few poor little things whose fate literally compelled our aid, and more than 2,000 were finally taken up by Christian Herald readers to be cared for until able to look after themselves. The number is now reduced each year by those who go forth able, through your steadfast friendship, to live honorable lives and, for the most part, devoted Christian lives. At present 680 remain, dependent upon your bounty.

We speak of this work here for the double purpose of calling attention to the coming accounts of it at first hand from Mr. Williams and to afford our readers the opportunity to give to the support of the work. We shall very soon have to send another quarterly remittance, sufficient for three months, and the fund for this purpose needs prompt and liberal replenishment. We have never known of a reader who regretted having had a part in this unique benevolence, and we are sure the returns upon the "investment" are exceptionally good.

Please address, China Orphans, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. We shall also be glad to have you send for the very interesting leaflet "Little Hai Ieh Tsi ('Abused Leaf')" if you would learn what it means to children in China to be unwanted. This is entirely free, and will be sent anywhere upon request.

The guide to this party—pick the lucky fellow out yourself—gets three dollars a week for covering the 10,000 feet up and then back five times in the seven days

At twelve such stations Mr. Williams had his fan stamped to prove he had ascended Fuji. This native, more proud of the achievement, has his back stamped (let us hope but once)

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

FIGHTING AGAIN IN MEXICO. Apparently in keeping with their promise to follow Villa vigorously, Carranza's troops have had several engagements with the followers of the bandit. On October 23 Carranza's advance guard was reported to have been ambushed by the Villistas in the region of Santa Ysabel. The Villistas seem to have been giving wide berth to General Pershing's patrols. Villa is reported to have several thousand men and to be again threatening Chihuahua City. The Mexican-American Commission has transferred its sittings to Atlantic City, N. J. The Mexican commissioners are reported to have suggested two plans for the withdrawal of General Pershing's troops, one of which contemplated the replacing of American soldiers with Mexican troops, the other being contingent upon the ability of the Carranza forces to show their good intentions in the pursuit of Villa. Neither plan has met the approval of the American commissioners. According to reports to date, no plan has been developed for joint patrol which is satisfactory to the Mexicans. Elections for Congress were held in Mexico on October 22, and were reported to have resulted in the election of a majority of the candidates of the Carranzista party. American troops and Mexicans exchanged shots across the Rio Grande near San José, Texas, on October 20. The Mexicans were not identified. No American soldiers were injured.

THE SINEWS OF WAR. During the week of October 19 it was announced that American bankers had completed a loan to the French government of $100,000,000. The loan is based on acceptances of French commercial houses covering exports, the French government negotiating for some forty concerns. During the same week it was announced that a collateral loan of $300,000,000 to England had been practically arranged. This is especially interesting in view of a statement in the British Commons during the same week that Great Britain, for herself and her allies, was spending $10,000,000 a day in the United States.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RATE CASE REOPENED. On October 21 the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered the Transcontinental rate case reopened and set dates for hearings. The section of the decision reopened is that applying to rates on commodities from Eastern territories to the Pacific coast terminal and intermediate points, and also rates on barley, beans, canned goods, dried fruits and wine from California ports by rail and water through Galveston to Atlantic seaboard points.

ANOTHER PIECE OF CHINA. Not to be outdone by their allies in the north, the French at Tientsin on October 21 forcibly seized a square mile of the city adjoining the French concession. The Chinese police were arrested and French marines took their places. The territory seized was the sole remaining district occupied by natives in the foreign concession area at Tientsin.

TO CONQUER IN THE AIR. The navy and army bills appropriated about $17,000,000 for aviation. It was announced on October 19 that the army had ordered 375 aeroplanes as a beginning for its flying squadron. This order included battleplanes, pursuit machines capable of making 120 miles an hour, and bomb-droppers, the total order representing an outlay of about $6,000,000. One hundred of the machines were school machines, to be used in training aviators. On the 20th it was announced that the Navy Department had ordered 75 seaplanes, a dirigible balloon and two new kite balloons. It was also announced that the navy contemplated ordering a dirigible balloon to cost, with its hangar, about $500,000.

THROUGH EARTHQUAKE AND STORM. A series of earthquake shocks was felt on October 18 throughout Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia, and on the same day the Gulf coast of Georgia and Florida was swept by a hurricane which at one time reached a velocity of 114 miles an hour. Houses were unroofed, vessels were blown ashore or sunk, telephone and telegraph wires were leveled. One life was lost. On October 22 a storm on the Great Lakes destroyed four vessels and took fifty lives.

FOR PEACE AT THE POINT OF THE BAYONET. On October 24, at a luncheon of the Foreign Press Association in London, Viscount Grey, British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, discussed peace. He reiterated the determination of Great Britain and her allies to fight until they could make peace at terms satisfactory to themselves, and repeated much that has been said before as to the efforts of Great Britain and the other countries concerned to avoid war in 1914. Then he discussed the relation of neutral countries to the war, and answering a question as to what they could do, he said, "I believe the best work neutrals can do for the moment is to try to prevent a war like this from happening again. If the nations had been united in such an agreement and prompt in resolution to insist in 1914 that the dispute must be referred to a conference or to The Hague, and that the Belgian treaty must be observed, there would have been no war." Speaking of the League to Enforce Peace, which both President Wilson and Mr. Hughes are supporting, and which aims not at forcing peace in the present struggle but at making peace secure in the future, he said: "It is a work of neutral countries to which we should all look with favor and hope. Only we must bear this in mind: if the nations after the war are able to do something effective by binding themselves with the common object of preserving peace, they must be prepared to undertake no more than they are able to uphold by force, and to see, when the time of crisis comes, that it is upheld by force. The question we must ask them is: 'Will you play up when the time comes?' It is not merely the sign manual of presidents and sovereigns that is really to make that worth while; it must also have behind it parliaments and national sentiments."

TO ARGENTINA BY SEA, CANAL AND RAIL. Since the reopening of regular service on the Panama Canal, an increasing number of persons have been making the trip from Argentina to New York via Valparaiso, Chile, and the Canal. The journey from Buenos Aires to Valparaiso by rail requires about a day and a half. From Buenos Aires to New York direct it is 5,871 miles. From Valparaiso to New York, the dis nce is 4,633 miles, of which 1,970 mil are on the Atlantic. The voyage om Valparaiso to Balboa, at the P ific end of the Canal, takes about f een days. The voyage from Colon to ew York, from five to eight days.

FIFTY PER CENT. MAKING G OD. The Committee on Employment o the National Committee on Prisons re orts that 10,000 well-known firms throu out the United States are ready to giv the men who have served their term an other chance to make good. In sp e of the fact that our prisons are f of them run with any idea of p paring the prisoner for later u fulness, and in spite of the fac hat prison influence in many ca s is hostile to all that is best in a an, the committee is able to port that of the men whom they ave placed in positions, fifty per ent have stuck to their work and ave made good. THE RAW MATERIALS OF ROSPERITY. In the fiscal year e ding June 30, the United ates imported more than $1,00 00,000 worth of tropical mercha lise, nearly all of which entere nto manufactures of some d ree. The imports included the f owing items: sugar, $300,00 000; rubber, $160,000,000; raw silk $125,000,000; coffee, $11 ,00,000; fibers, $60,000,000; uits and nuts, $40,000,000; c ton, $40,000,000; cocoa, $35,00 000 and another million whic included tea, vegetable oils, ans rice, pork, spices, cabinet ods ostrich feathers, vanilla ans dye-stuffs, quinine bark, ta ning materials, indigo, ivory, ory nuts, licorice root, sago, t ioca and sponges.

SWEETENING A CENTURY. According to the Boston Tran ipt the price of sugar today less than the cost of refining a hu dred years ago, while the total amou t of sugar refined in New York City i 1816 was less than 9,000,000 poun an amount which the largest refin y in the city could now handle in forty ight hours. In 1816, from a hundred p nds of raw sugar, a refiner was a to obtain about fifty pounds of ined sugar, twenty-five pounds of m sses and twenty-five pounds of wha was called bastard sugar. In refining day a loss of six to seven pounds the hundred is all that is expected. Ta f on raw sugar in 1816 was three c ts a pound, upon refined sugar twelve nts; the consumer paid about twenty ents a pound. Today refined sugar ters duty free and raw sugar pays a d y of but a cent a pound. One of the most important items in the distribut n of sugar has been the cost of the rrel. The American Sugar Refining Co any now makes its own barrels and wns 625 square miles of standing timbe rom which to cut the material for its c perage. The barrel factories turn ou over 7,000,000 barrels a year, using up out 80,000,000 feet of timber.

AMERICANS BATTLE IN SANT DOMINGO. In an engagement be ween American troops and Dominican bels under General Ramon Batista, s eral Americans were killed, includin two captains of marines. General ista was killed and his forces were com tely defeated. American troops hav een in possession of the Dominican ital since May 8, when the insur tion broke out against President Jime z.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON the Picardy front, Friday, October 20, the British, on the northern portion of this front, attempted to break through the German positions from Le Sars to Morval, and for more than six hours launched attack after attack, without succeeding. In the evening, however, they did gain some ground north of Eaucourt L'Abbaye and Grandcourt, but this gain was slight. On the French portion of this front the battle, while as fierce as to the north, was much more scientific, and without disproportionate loss. The French succeeded late in the afternoon in finally repulsing determined German attacks in Sailly-Sallisel, the village which the French won the day before.

In the last three weeks, the portion of this Picardy advance covered by the British has gradually contracted and the portion covered by the French has expanded to the same degree as the British has contracted. At the beginning the British covered about three-fifths of the total front of the Allied advance. Today they cover just under one-third.

The following day the Germans scored on the British by recapturing the trenches on the road from Eaucourt l'Abbaye to le Bargue, which the Britons took from them on October 18. The British later on made an unsuccessful attack north of Courcelette and to the east of Le Sars, on the road leading to Bapaume. The Germans further reported putting three of the British "tanks" out of business with heavy artillery. A German attack on the Schwaben redoubt failed.

On Sunday, north of the Somme, the British made an attack, after heavy artillery preparation, toward the Ancre River in the direction of Grandcourt and Pys, two hamlets northwest of Le Sars. This attack extended as far to the east as Grandcourt and was to a degree successful on the western end, but was repulsed on the eastern. The British announced that 800 prisoners had fallen into their hands, while the Germans assert that the losses of the British were very severe.

Farther to the east some hard fighting took place near Sailly-Sallisel, where the French attacked unsuccessfully. South of the Somme the Germans recaptured some trenches recently lost between Biaches and La Maisonette, south of Peronne, and captured 175 Frenchmen. Still farther south, near Chaulnes, hard fighting took place. Here the Germans made three separate attacks on the French positions. According to the French all these attacks were completely repulsed with serious losses and 150 prisoners taken.

The British captured 1,000 yards of German trenches on Monday to the east of Gueudecourt and Les Bœufs, north of the Somme. The only activity south of the Somme was by the artilleries in the vicinity of Chaulnes. The following day there was very hard fighting north of the Somme, particularly to the west of Transloy and Gueudecourt. From the silence of the British and French regarding this fighting we may reasonably assume that the German version that the attacks were completely repulsed with extraordinary losses was not far from the truth. South of the Somme the French started an attack on the Ablaincourt-Chaulnes line, which was broken up by the German artillery before it made much progress.

On Wednesday and Thursday bad weather prevailed, so that there was but little activity. North of the Somme the French made an attack on the Les Bœufs-Rancourt line, but gained no ground, while the British were absolutely quiet, as were the French south of the river.

For some time past there has been little fighting on the western battle line, except on the Picardy front, but this was not the case in the week under review, October 19–26. On Tuesday, the 24th, the French delivered the heaviest and most important blow to the Germans which the latter have received in some time. Not only is this blow important in itself, but it also has even now considerable significance as to the strength of the German line on the western front, and, if followed up with anything like the same results, its significance will become even more accentuated.

About 9 o'clock Tuesday morning, after an artillery preparation which the bulletin described as intense, the French launched a general attack against the German positions on the north front of Verdun which was completely and cleanly successful. Starting from approximately an east and west line drawn through Fleury, in the center, the French drove north for a distance of very nearly two miles and recaptured the much-fought-over fort of Douaumont and the village of the same name.

On the left of Fort Douaumont, the field work and the farm of Thiaumont also fell into French hands, as well as the quarry of Haudremont farther to the west, from which point to Bras the advance reached and established itself along the road running northeasterly from that village to Douaumont.

To the right of Douaumont the gain was not so great, but the Cailette wood and the Chenois wood were cleared completely of Germans, and on the extreme right the line was pushed up to the Damloup battery. This advance, however, is sufficient to render the German tenure of Fort Vaux rather a precarious one. The French reported the capture of about 4,500 officers and men, as well as of considerable material, and stated that their losses were small, which latter assertion may be taken as a routine phrase, since losses in a frontal attack on a front of three to four miles against troops of good quality in strong positions can never be small.

The psychological effect of this victory on the French is bound to be very considerable indeed. The rest of the western line was quiet all the week.

THE French are planning a 2,500-mile railroad from Bordeaux to Odessa, to be constructed after the war, for the purpose of offsetting the Berlin-Bagdad railroad and eliminating Germany as the intermediary for Russian trade. The line will pass through Turin, Milan, Trieste, Belgrade and Bucharest. It is to be observed that all of the territory over which the line is to pass from Trieste

Are We Keeping the War Going?

ALTHOUGH estimates necessarily vary in the statistics that have appeared from time to time of the lives sacrificed in the great war, enough has been furnished to convince the most militant mind that the nations of Europe are in danger of irreparable depletion. One authority, after an exhaustive examination of all the facts available, gives the total casualties of all kinds among the European combatants up to a recent date at 18,500,000. This includes killed, wounded, captured and missing. The losses of the Allies, which have been greatly swelled by the recent drives, he believes to be at least 2,000,000 in excess of those of the Central Powers. To France, Russia, Great Britain and Italy he assigns a total of 10,000,000, losses and casualties of all kinds inclusive, and to the Central Powers 8,000,000. The heaviest loser of all is Russia, which, throwing her troops in great wave masses against the enemy, has suffered casualties aggregating between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000. Narrowed down, the Allies have permanently lost one-sixth of their man-power and the Central Powers one-third. The war which began in Serbia two years ago, he reckons, has already claimed victims equal to the entire population of the Balkan kingdom.

At the present rate of human wastage, if the attrition goes on for any considerable period, the sacrifice of the best physical capital of the nations involved must prove irreparable. When Gustavus Adolphus ended his military career, after all his victories, he left his country with a population consisting of little else than children and the aged, and drained of all of its gold and silver. But there is no parallel for comparison between even the longest and bloodiest of ancient wars and that of today.

For many months past the great war has practically stood at a deadlock. Alternating triumphs and reverses have come, but the situation has not been materially changed by these. Preparations are already being made for the campaign of next spring and summer, which may be a repetition of the fluctuating fortunes of 1916. Even with the appalling losses already suffered in view, the question whether any nation or group of nations on either side is justified in continuing this tremendous wastage of human life does not seem to have been considered. It is a death-grip in which neither side dares let go. That this terrible situation is realized, however, to some extent we may gather from occasional utterances of European statesmen. Viscount Grey, the British Secretary of Foreign Affairs, in a recent address, while admitting the frightful character of the war, expressed gratification that the people of America had organized a league not for the purpose of interfering with the war, but to "make peace secure in the future." He said:

"It is a work of neutral countries to which we should all look with favor and hope. Only we must bear this in mind: if the nations after the war are able to do something effective by binding themselves with the common object of preserving peace, they must be prepared to undertake not more than they are able to uphold by force, and to see, when the time of crisis comes, that it is upheld by force."

This is merely a sop to Cerberus. The question which the whole world is asking today is: How can any plea be submitted in justification of this endless human slaughter, which the belligerent powers propose to continue indefinitely? Viscount Grey knows, Minister Lloyd-George knows, Chancellor von Hollweg knows, and all the other statesmen know perfectly well, that there can be no justification, either present or prospective, for keeping up the butchery, and none know better than the peoples of the warring countries themselves, who are the helpless victims. Throughout the war thus far, but little attention has been paid to the rights or remonstrances of neutrals. Nor is there any good reason to expect that, after the war, any more consideration will be given to them than now. This would be equally true, whichever side wins.

But there is a question which interests every American, and it is this: Are we responsible for keeping the war going? The United States has been supplying enormous quantities of foodstuffs, as well as war material, to the belligerents. Our people are coining immense fortunes out of the war, but the middle class and the poor among us are sufferers from the high prices, for which our vast war export trade is directly responsible. Now we are approaching a food crisis which threatens to force up the price of bread and foodstuffs generally to unheard-of figures, unless we act wisely and promptly. The wheat crop of the United States last year was insufficient to fill the war export demand and to meet our own domestic requirements, and of course domestic consumers suffered. The wheat crop this year is only 585,000,000 bushels, or 25 per cent. less than last year's total crop. We need for home consumption 625,000,000 bushels. It is evident from these figures that, with a shortage of 40,000,000 bushels for home needs' supply, we cannot fill war export orders except at the sacrifice of home consumers, and at the risk of making the poor man's loaf cost almost double. Nor is the wheat shortage confined to this country, for that of Canada is reported as a failure; the Russian crop is woefully short, and the world's supply will be at least 30 per cent. short of that of last year. Meanwhile brokers representing foreign buyers are purchasing millions of bushels of American wheat a day at a rate which threatens to send so much of it out of the country that nothing short of a famine is to be expected. Wheat is selling at $1.70 a bushel. According to the New York Times, our exports, together with those of Canada, for the last three months have been at the rate of 400,000,000 bushels a year!

With these facts clearly in mind, it is criminal to continue sending wheat abroad to feed the belligerents, when it is inevitable that such a course must cause general suffering and distress, with unapproachable food prices, at home.

It should be the duty of our government to protect our people against such conditions, and to avert famine by stopping all the exports of wheat until the food crisis is past. There is "money in wheat," but it is money for the producers and speculators only; for the warring countries would pay any price rather than go without. "An army," says the old proverb, "travels on its belly," implying the necessity of a full commissariat. The foodless army cannot fight, and one of the quickest ways to stop the sanguinary and wicked slaughter and bring the belligerents to their senses, and in a mood to listen to peace proposals, would be to declare a wheat embargo against all Europe for an indefinite period.

Our nation has many times fought famine in other lands with bread; now let us see whether we cannot fight war by withholding food supplies, not from the innocent non-combatants but from the belligerents. It would be a step in the direction of a broader and more statesmanlike humanity than any we have yet attempted, and would be tardy justice to our own people, many of whom are starving under the present insufferable régime of high food prices.

The Decalogue to Stand

WE congratulate our Episcopalian friends on the wise decision of the Protestant Episcopal Convention against the proposition to shorten the Decalogue. There are few indeed who have found the Ten Commandments tedious in a religious service, and it was a matter of surprise to Christian people of all denominations when the Commission on Prayer Book Revision reported in favor of abbreviating five of the commandments by the elimination of the reasons contained in the text. The failure of a movement which to many minds had an aspect of irreverence—although we cannot for a moment attribute such a thought to the Commission—was not unexpected. In its present form, the Decalogue has come down to us through so many centuries, and is so hallowed by holy memories, that to lay ruthless hands upon it now would have been regarded as sacrilege. Efficiency and conciseness are a part of the spirit of the age, but there are certain things too sacred to be tampered with. We should fail to find anywhere approval of a proposition to reduce any of the famous passages which have become immortal as showing the religious spirit of a former age, but which are equally applicable to the present day. Among these are the Lord's Prayer, the Shepherd Psalm, the Sermon on the Mount, and the Law given on Sinai. The world is richer and religion nobler for their continued existence and general use.

Ever a Song

"THERE is ever a song somewhere," sings the poet.

Let's go him a little better and say that there is ever a song everywhere!—if we have the ear attuned to it.

The cultured musicians will tell you that what the masters sing in their strange and complex studies is the highest music to those who are trained to catch it.

But the simple heart finds the harmony in the simple, lowly melodies.

What to the one class is purest music, to the other is meaningless noise.

If we just knew how to listen we could love he songs of each.

To some the jingle of money is the only musi n the world. It deafens them to all other sounds.

To some the melody of their own names spoke in praise is the only music worth hearing. The ear of these seem to open inward. The greedy and the in shrink the whole world to their own size.

But to those who can hear it there is a song in e y phase of life. Fortunate is he who can hear re than a very few.

The whistles of the factories, the roar of the tr ns and the rattle of the wagons and cars in the b sy streets are clamant discord only to those who ca ot hear in them the magnificent orchestration of indu y—the overture to civilization.

The cries of want and the wails of despair are h eous, frightful sounds, except to those who can resp d in notes that blend into a symphony of brotherly ve and helpfulness—a song so sweet that the angel of heaven must lean and listen.

Sonatas fine and rare or melodies simple and s et are in every human voice, to be heard by all w se hearts can thrill with understanding and sympa y.

Not all the great humns are chanted thr h traceried windows, while Lazarus lies at the doors p; for never diviner song ascends than when one m 's hand meets another's helpfully.

There is ever a song somewhere—everywhere if we will but help to sing it.

CHARLES GRANT MILLE

The Next War

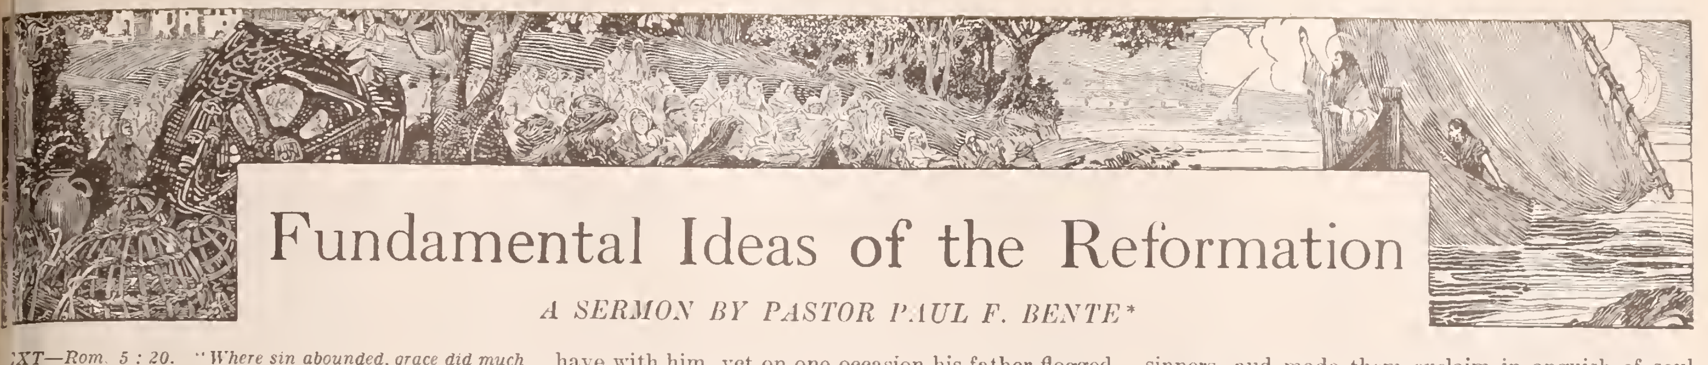
OUR contemporary, The Independent, rem ks that the greatest material problem affec g the American people is whether the g t increase in trade—the prevailing prosperity, as m y call it—is to continue or not after the war. It sub ts that if we were Germany, we should probably ha a government commission on the job of making g gestions as to the best course we ought to pur e; "but being the United States, we shall probably le e all these matters to the college professors and W ll Street to theorize and practicalize about." Har y. Any well-balanced citizen or capable business n could tell The Independent that our war-time p sperity is like a house built on sand. Switzerland as had its war trade boom, but the bubble is now al t to collapse in consequence of the threatened stop e of her export traffic in munitions—a trade that as made possible by the use of German coal and Ger n steel. In our own case, the biggest business fi s foresee conditions after the war which will demonst te the truth of the old Bible warning that riches n take wings and that prosperity attained at the sacr e of principle is not the kind to endure. Our wi st course is to put theorizing aside and to prepar s best we can for the trade war which the united fo s of the old world are even now preparing to w e against us when the guns are silent and the bat-storm has died away.

Remember the Orphans of China

THESE are trying days for our missionarie n China. At more than twenty mission stat s there are some 680 orphans for whose sup t the missionaries look confidently to friends in Am ica. Many of our readers have been associated h this beautiful work of child-saving for several y s past, and have given generously in aid of it. T s year, owing to the multitude of other demands, e know that benevolence is sorely taxed, but we w d remind our friends of the orphans who are look g eagerly and gratefully to them for help. We t t that those who have stood by the work, which is n nearing a close, will continue their support, that e missionaries may not be unduly hampered for the l k of funds. Twenty dollars covers the cost of sup t and training of an orphan for a whole year.

The need is urgent, and we trust that every e who reads this appeal will respond as speedily s possible. There could be no finer or more appropri e remembrance of the Thanksgiving season which s now approaching than a contribution for a work wh h has such large possibilities of spiritual and mate l good. We know that it has given pleasure and sa faction to many who have helped it in the past, d that their kindness has been the means of brighten g the young lives of many of those outcast little o s who were snatched from slavery and death by e kindhearted missionaries.

Small gifts are welcome, and every dollar s applied undiminished to orphan support. Se d your gift now.



Fundamental Ideas of the Reformation

*A SERMON BY PASTOR PAUL F. BENTE

XT—Rom. 5 : 20. "Where sin abounded, grace did much m abound."

THE days of the Reformation were great in glorious deeds and far-reaching achievements. Ecclesiastical tyranny was broken, and Christendom received a new baptism in the laver of vangelical freedom. The civil and religious li ty which characterize our time are a direct fruit of uther's work. Next to the early victories of C stianity, the annals of history describe nothing gr ter. Inspiring is its Christian courage, which re ved a century later in Gustavus Adolphus.

the name of God, Luther and his companions ed a hostile world, which was seeking to devour h. "I believed, therefore have I spoken," was ea man's motto. The world has seen no finer co age than that displayed at Worms, when Luther, en to retract, exclaimed, "Here I stand, I cannot d otherwise, God help me! Amen." Remarkable is e firmness of purpose and steadfastness of will th e days beheld. Having known the truth, neither nor favor moved them. Pope and emperor left no tone unturned to shake Luther. They ridiculed as a drunken German; the cardinal Cajetan tried to rowbeat him into recanting; Mitlitz, the papal nberlain, begged him with tears to forsake his p tion; Dr. Eck tried to frighten him into submis- si with ban and interdict. All in vain. Luther d firm in the truth.

onderful was the religious life which pulsated th ugh Christian hearts in those days. The Ref- ation hymnology reveals a heart now dejected a cast down, now in exultant strains bidding de- fi e to all enemies, now with childlike simplicity re cing in the Christmas story. And with what en- th iasm were those hymns sung! The old chronicles te us how entire countries were won for the Gospel b hese hymns; how they frightened priests out of th pulpits when they attempted to force the old m sage of righteousness by works upon their unwill- in audiences.

he days of the Reformation were great also be- e wonderful ideas and truths were brought forth fr the treasure-house of Holy Writ. When Luther p ched, all Wittenberg flocked to the castle church; w n he taught in the university, students crowded t lecture halls to the very doors. His books were r so eagerly that an edition was frequently ex- sted as soon as it left the printer's hands. And th e ideas and truths which Luther mined from the ri veins of Scripture were at the foundation of all t faith, firmness, and enthusiasm. Scriptural doc- t e was the moving and propelling power. Luther a omplished everything by teaching the truth, and ing by physical force, craft or deceit. Those w e the weapons his enemies employed. Luther r d only upon the Word. Truth, which had long b n crushed to earth, again lifted its mighty head a prevailed. This truth we find tersely expressed i ur text, "Where sin abounded, grace did much m e abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, e so might grace reign through righteousness unto e nal life."

HE first thought of our text is that where sin abounds, it reigns unto death. Sin abounds w n it is recognized as the most destructive thing i e world—a poison which no human antidote can n tralize. Sin abounds when it becomes exceeding si ul. Then it also reigns unto death. When sin is f man is swallowed by sorrow, and in despair r gns all hope of a blissful hereafter.

n abounding and ruling unto death was the one p ciple of the Reformation. The feeling of sin- f ess and its resultant sense of unworthiness burned li an acid in Luther's conscience. Even in the m st of learned study or the enjoyments of student li he could never shake off for any length of time the c sciousness of an angry Judge enthroned above, b athing out threatenings and damnation against h , if he did not satisfy all the strict commands of G , and make good the shortcomings of his life.

ome discipline, school experience, and the teach- i of the church all combined to bring about this r lt. Martin Luther grew up in a home where f er and mother took their parental duties seriously a interpreted them rigorously. While the children w e dearly loved, parental authority was strictly m ntained. Though the reformer records in touch- i language many instances of his father's kindness a of the sweet communion he was permitted to have with him, yet on one occasion his father flogged him so severely that for some time after he fled from him in fear. On another occasion his mother whipped him till the blood came because he had taken a paltry nut. This parental strictness gave him a timorous conscience and made him keenly sensitive to every fault. Even as a child he was frequently distressed by his sins and terrified by the fear of eternal punishment. In the language of our text, sin abounded in him.

NOR did school life blunt this tender conscience. In those days whipping went hand in hand with learning. The reformer relates how he was whipped fifteen times in the course of one forenoon, without any fault of his, having been called on to recite what he had never been taught. In the grammar school at Mansfeld, at Eisenach, where he studied four years, as well as at the university in Erfurt, God was never represented to him as a loving Father who has pity on his children, but as a being "unapproachably sublime, and of awful holiness." Instead of a benignant Saviour, who is "touched with a feeling of our infirmities," Christ was pictured as a stern, angry Judge, seated on a rainbow, with a drawn sword, come to judge the wicked, and whose favor could be obtained only through the intercession of the saints. At Eisenach he saw "a wooden figure of the Virgin with the infant Saviour in her arms, furnished with a secret contrivance by means of which the child turned to his mother when people prayed to him, and only after she had been invoked would he bow toward them with arms outstretched." Thus Luther's schooling increased his terror and accentuated his apprehensiveness. It made sin abound in him, and reign unto death. He tells us, "They forced poor, timid, tempted hearts to dread and fear Christ even more than the devil!"

Nor did the convent quiet his conscience. In a fit of terror Luther had vowed to enter the cloister, there by mass, penance, and prayer to expiate his sins. Almost daily he resorted to the confessional and had absolution pronounced on himself. He entered assiduously upon the fasting, vigils, prayer and other penances which were imposed on him, and did far more than was demanded of him. But all in vain. He declares, "When most devout, I went to the altar a doubter and left the altar a doubter. When I had rendered my confession, I still doubted; and I doubted when I did not render it." He was never taught to appreciate the Gospel of pardon through Christ's sacrifice, and therefore never gained the assurance that he was free from sin, and that his prayers were heard by God. "The more we wash our hands, the fouler they grow," became a frequent saying with him. Nor must we imagine that youthful excesses and other gross sins burdened his conscience. The numerous faults in thought, word and deed which, in spite of the utmost care, every day brings to frail mortals, and which are not regarded as sins by most people, were the occasion of his anguish. Finding no comfort, there finally arose in his mind a constant restlessness and disquiet, and at times he was seized with fits of despair which tempted him to blaspheme the Most High. Sin abounded in him and reigned mightily unto death. Luther describes his condition as follows:

"Fast bound in Satan's chains I lay;
   Death brooded darkly o'er me;
My sin oppressed me night and day,
   Wherein my mother bore me;
Deeper and deeper still I fell,
Life had become a living hell,
   So firmly sin possessed me.

"My good works could avail me nought,
   For they with sin were stainèd;
Free will against God's judgment fought.
   And dead to good remainèd;
Grief drove me to despair, and I
Had nothing left me but to die;
   To hell I fast was sinking."

THIS idea of the exceeding sinfulness of sin became one of the fundamental principles of the Reformation, for Luther never ceased to preach the truth which he had experienced so deeply. From the pulpit and the professor's chair and in his writings, he continually set forth the hideousness and abounding wickedness of sin, describing it as transgression of the law, rebellion against God, and defilement of self, which receives damnation as its wages. This idea acted also as a leaven in the hearts and consciences of his hearers and readers. It terrified the sinners, and made them exclaim in anguish of soul, "What must I do to be saved?" Yet this idea alone could never have produced the mighty changes and the new life of the Reformation. Sin reigns unto death, and the idea of sin abounding could only end in despair. Another idea and thought was necessary —Grace.

As sin abounded and reigned unto death, even so grace did also much more abound and reign through righteousness unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. That is the second thought of the text. Be the sins that trouble a conscience ever so great and numerous, the grace of God supplies a sinner with the righteousness of Christ, which is far greater. No matter how troubled and wounded the conscience, it can find balm and healing in the grace of God; no matter how cast down the soul, God's grace can lift it up. "Plenteous grace with thee is found, grace to cover all my sins."

That was the other and wonderful experience which Luther underwent. God did not suffer his servant to perish in fiery trials, but guided him safely through the night of sin unto the day of grace. In the course of his convent life, he unburdened his heart to Staupitz, the vicar-général of the order of monks to which Luther belonged, who taught him that repentance is an inward change which proceeds from the love of God and not from the fear of his wrath; that he could not hope to find peace with God by looking to his own good resolutions, which were never kept, nor to his own good works, which could never satisfy the law of God, but only by trusting in God's forgiving mercy. And when Luther declared that he feared that God in his eternal counsel had consigned him to damnation, Staupitz answered: "God's eternal purpose shines clearly in the wounds of Christ." Thus the daystar began to rise in Luther's heart.

Firm ground for faith in abounding grace, however, he gained only by the study of Holy Writ, which he carried on with indefatigable zeal and industry, frequently occupying himself for days together with a single passage. For a long time he was much perplexed to know what Paul meant by "the righteousness of God" (Rom. 1 : 17), understanding by it the righteousness which inheres in God and compels him to punish sin, and in that sense he hated and dreaded the words. But after long and earnest study of the passage, God led him to distinguish aright between law and Gospel, and to understand that Paul does not proclaim a righteousness whereby God punishes sin, but the righteousness of Christ, which God imputes to those who believe his message of mercy, and whereby he justifies and acquits them. Hereupon he perused the Scriptures in eager search to see if this were true indeed, and found that both the Old and New Testaments declare that "man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." With this discovery the daystar had fully risen in his heart, for a grace was now revealed to him that abounded more than sin, and that "reigned through righteousness unto eternal life through Jesus Christ." All gloomy thoughts about the secret will of God forsook him, for grace abounded in his heart much more than sin. Fear of eternal torment vanished, for grace reigned unto eternal life. Grace made him a happy and cheerful man, a humble child of prayer, and a giant of history.

THIS idea of grace abounding more than sin is the second principle of the Reformation, for Luther preached to the people what he himself had experienced. Since the days of Paul, no man spoke of grace as did Luther. He declared, with great emphasis, that God does not give eternal life as a reward for man's sufferings, works, or penances, but bestows it from love and mercy on those who believe his Gospel promise. He explained again and again that Christ performed all that we should have done, and earned for us a spotless righteousness which is freely distributed, and which man appropriates by faith. Thus the entire Reformation was pervaded by the idea of grace.

Sin abounding and grace abounding more than sin —those were the keynotes, the fundamental ideas of the Reformation, which wrought its mighty changes and established the new order. Sin reigning unto death, but grace unto eternal life—those were the ideas that filled the hearts of Luther and his associates, making them heroes of the faith. Sin abounding and grace abounding more than sin—those were the doctrines that broke the power of Antichrist and built up a new church. Sin reigning unto death but grace unto eternal life—that is the leaven of the Reformation.

CHAPTER III

My First Arrest—Age Eleven

I MADE St. Louis late at night and forced a window in a stable. Crawling into a warm corner of the hay I was soon fast asleep. Toward morning the owner of the building and a cop appeared. I was picked up for entry and further accused of threatening to set fire to the premises!

The judge before whom I was arraigned tried as well as he knew how to show me the folly of my ways. I wonder if he had boys of his own. I hope not. I wonder how many other boys had previously been brought before him. I wonder how many followed me into his kindly, considerate hands. What a story the history of all those lives would probably make could they now be written!

He listened carefully to the charges they preferred against me—that one paid officer of the law and that big man, the owner of the stable—the charges they preferred against me, an unknown child.

Instantly he made up his mind—he knew at once just the best way to handle my case—how best to put me in the frame of mind not to go into another man's stable to sleep. Why shouldn't this man—this judge—know what to do with me? Hadn't he been practicing on other boys for years?

And so this judge—this man who had taken an oath to administer justice impartially to all who came before him—told me in open court before many people that I was a worthless, vicious boy—that there wasn't room for me in his city; and he wound up his tirade by giving me the privilege of leaving the city for good within twenty-four hours, or of being sent away for a year. I chose the former.

Picture that crime against me!

Imagine such a man as that holding down such a job.

He practically said to me that morning in court: "You're helpless and worthless. You'll never be any good. You belong in prison; but get out of here! We don't want to clog our jails with the likes of you. Get out of St. Louis! Go somewhere else and break the law there—not here."

I crossed the river to East St. Louis on a boat. I don't think the bridge had been built then. A train on the Ohio and Mississippi, now the Baltimore and Ohio, was pulling out. I went blind baggage and at Tunnelton, Ohio, the crew found me all but blinded by the smoke and cinders. I was in mighty bad shape. They took me off and left me with some railroad men, who, taking pity on me because of my age, fixed me up and fed me up. In a short time I was able to travel. The men then gave me a pass on a passenger train to Cincinnati.

I was sick again before I left the train, and after two or three days of aimless roving about Cincinnati, I was desperately ill with malarial fever. Being a Catholic, I experienced no difficulty in securing admittance to a Sisters' hospital. I've forgotten the name of the institution, but for two months I lay there seriously ill. Finally, when I became convalescent, they transferred me to a Catholic Protectory two or three miles outside the city. There a young student for the priesthood became interested in me and I spent a good deal of time in his company. Two or three times he took me to a show in the city. On one of these trips, in the meantime having become restless, I ran away from him and the institution. I remember how he begged me not to leave him, as an escape would count against him. His appeal was useless! He was a kind fellow, for he might have spoken to the policeman who stood near us, and who would have arrested me at once.

You mustn't forget that all this time I was stealing everything I wanted from any one I wanted to. I had become very expert with my hands. I could pick a door-lock, open a locked window, extract a pocket book or open a cash drawer with great skill and dexterity. Nothing frightened me, nothing stopped me; and yet I hadn't reached the age of twelve.

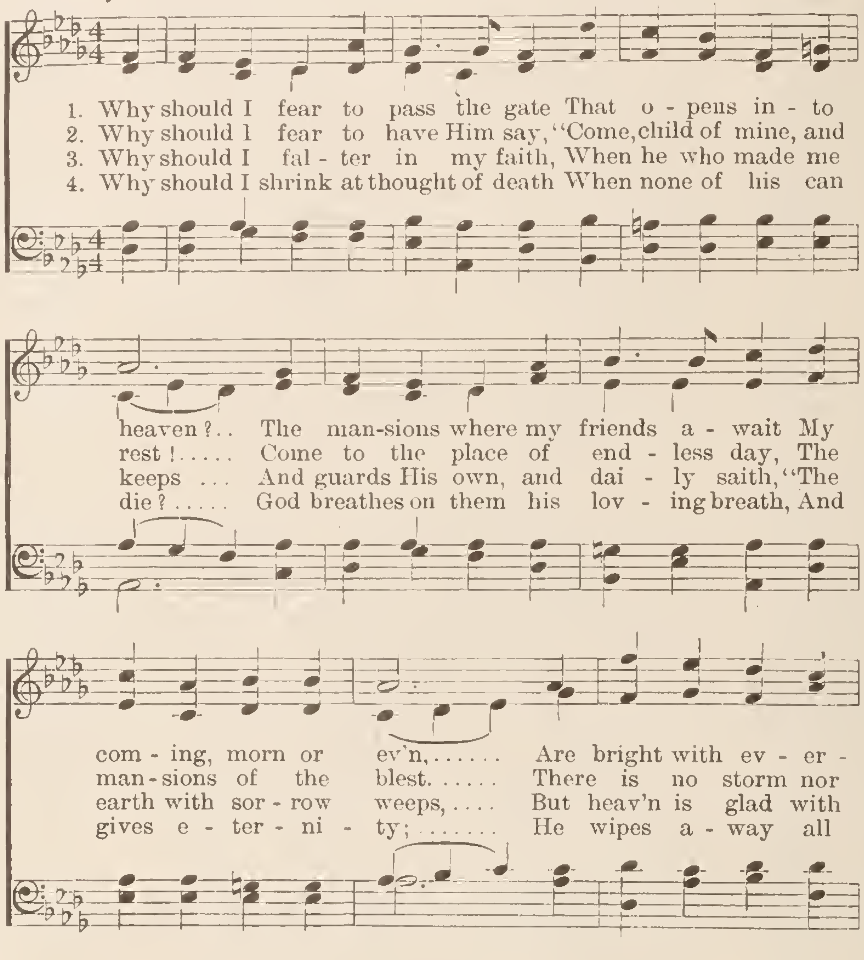
Not liking Cincinnati, now that I had run away from the Protectory, I jumped a freight on the Panhandle and made Pittsburg. On leaving the railroad yards I braced the first man I met and told him a hard luck story—a bunch of lies, of course. He proved easy and took me to his house near an iron foundry of which he was assistant superintendent. Frederick Jones was his name. I wonder if he is still alive. He did all for me that a father could have done. He clothed and fed me and insisted that I stay with him till I fully recovered from the effects of the fever. When I was again able to travel, he took up a collection for me from among his friends, and with the money we bought a ticket to New York. That was the first time I'd ever paid for a fare on a railroad, and yet I'd ridden hundreds and hundreds of miles.

Notwithstanding the fact that in those days a boy with a ready tongue could beg almost anything he wanted, I did comparatively little of it. It was too tame; it offered no excitement. I much preferred to steal, for that seemed to satisfy me.

"Why Should I Fear?"

Words by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon

Music by A. B. Morton



1. Why should I fear to pass the gate That o-pens in-to heaven?.. The man-sions where my friends a-wait My com-ing, morn or ev'n,...... Are bright with ev-er-last-ing bloom Of flow'rs that grow in ev-'ry room.
2. Why should I fear to have Him say, "Come, child of mine, and rest!..... Come to the place of end-less day, The man-sions of the blest...... There is no storm nor tem-pest here, No pain nor sor-row, care nor fear."
3. Why should I fal-ter in my faith, When he who made me keeps ... And guards His own, and dai-ly saith, "The earth with sor-row weeps,.... But heav'n is glad with songs that bear A har-mo-ny be-yond com-pare."
4. Why should I shrink at thought of death When none of his can die?..... God breathes on them his lov-ing breath, And gives e-ter-ni-ty;...... He wipes a-way all tears from eyes That o-pen in-to Par-a-dise.

CHAPTER IV

In New York and in Trouble in One Night

ON my very first night in New York I was picked up by a cop. I was charged with a terrible crime—sleeping in a hallway! The authorities didn't know, mind you, whether I was a good boy or a bad boy, or whether I had ever been arrested before; but they locked me in a cell just the same. In the morning a chance was given me to tell my story and I told it. I told them I was an orphan, with an aunt in Boston. They didn't know whether I lied or told the truth. They made no effort to find out. Without notifying the Boston authorities that they were sending them a young boy and to be on the lookout for him; without waiting to learn whether I would shortly be reported missing from some home in New York, a policeman took me to the Fall River Line and shipped me East, like a barrel of pork.

Suppose your little boy should run away, and should later reach the police. Suppose he was foolish enough or wicked enough, call it whatever you will, to tell the police he lived in Boston. Suppose the police did with him as they did with me. Would you feel that such a system was a wise one? It makes a vast difference, you know, whether a man thinks generalities or whether he brings these right close at home.

In those days, and in much later days, too, such occurrences were common. There was no reason other than custom for dealing with police cases. Everybody got the same sort of senseless treatment dictated by custom. And that method came right on down through the years unaltered, until recently such men as Judge Ben Lindsey of Denver began to use common sense and humane methods, with results that have astonished a public long asleep, and have saved hundreds and hundreds of boys from leading lives of crime. And now an era of common sense and humanity is dawning in our manner of administering prisons. For years we threw men into our prisons. And what did we release? Were they better or worse for the punishment? What chance had they to go straight? What does the average individual think of a man who has been branded as a criminal? Tell me!

CHAPTER V

Doing My First "Bit"

BOSTON proved easy. For about four months I lived high and indulged my every boyish fancy on the proceeds of my stealing. I tackled everything that came within my ken and which looked at all promising. I knew no fear. Desire at once became determination; determination at once became action.

One day I deliberately walked into a candy store, helped myself to the contents of the cash drawer, and got away before the eyes of the astonished proprietress. But I had been too bold; too many had seen the trick, and I was picked up, tried and sent away.

They took me first to the almshouse at Tewksbury, a sort of detention station prior to delivery at a reform school. But they didn't know the boy they were handling, and as they made no effort to size me up, they paid for their carelessness. On the third day I planned to escape, and the next night made a clean getaway and took five other lads with me. All these boys weakened once they got beyond the walls, and in a few hours all of them had returned and given themselves up to the authorities. Not me, however!

I at once returned to Boston and stole right and left under their very noses. Five weeks, or thereabouts, thus went on before they caught me, red-handed, too, stealing fruit from a freight car. They were more careful in their handling of me this time, and saw to it that I was safely landed at once in the State Primary School near Palmer, Mass. Although it was about noon when I arrived, I had managed, quite easily by the way, to get into trouble by night, and then it was that I met the hospital nurse.

With the exception of the principal keeper of Sing Sing Prison for over thirty years, he was the most cruel and heartless man I ever knew. Each of them gloried in and thrived on misery and pain and discomfort in others, and neither of them was ever known to allow an opportunity to go by uncanceled, except on most rare occasions. Two men more wholly unfit for the jobs they held never lived, I know! I served under each! Under one as a boy! Under the other as a man! Who knows better than I know? Who could know better than I know? Each of these men secured his job through politics. Each man held his job through politics.

The hospital nurse looked at me. I wonder if he knew I was only 12 years old. I wonder if it would have made any difference if he had known. Two huge brass keys, each nearly a foot long, were suspended about his waist by a stout cord. And as he looked at me he slowly drew this cord in until the two big keys came into his hands. He held one in each fist.

The Noble Dissatisfaction

SUNDAY, November 12. Luke 6 : 21. "Blessed are ye that hunger now." That is one of the constant and full-sounding notes of the New Testament, the healthiness of a certain sort of hunger, the blessedness of a certain type of want. We hear its clarion in the first beatitude: "Blessed are the poor in spirit." For who are the poor in spirit but those who recognize their present poverty in comparison with their possible achievement? Every new possession in the inheritance of grace only increases their hunger for what remains to be claimed. Beyond the inch they hunger for the mile, beyond the mile they hunger for the league. They are never satiated. In their hearts there is always the holy sense of want. The good unfolds to them the better. The better unveils the best. And beyond the inconceivable best there is the world of the inconceivable, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, and which the wing of the strongest imagination is altogether unable to reach. And so these folk are hungry, and gloriously dissatisfied, "moving about in worlds not realized."

I suppose it is just here that we came upon the deadly lack in the soul of the Pharisee. The Pharisee had no hunger, no healthy, disturbing sense of want. He knew no consciousness of poverty. He regarded himself as rich. He was satisfied. He had attained. His life had no regions beyond. There stretched before him no entrancing prospect of territory yet to be traversed and won. He had no aching aspiration, no tense muscle of endeavor, striving in ever more wonderful crusades. He had arrived. "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up: take thine ease!" That was the spirit of pharisaism. And it was to the Pharisees that the Master gave this awful and startling warning: "Woe unto you that are full!"

Now, it is the dissatisfied who are the world's benefactors; I mean not only those who are dissatisfied with their own attainments but with the attainments of the race. They are possessed by a great sense of want. They cry with the prophet, "Woe is me, for I am unclean, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips." They are hungering for something better for themselves and for the race. They see the crooked and they yearn to make it straight; they see the rough places and they are eager to make them plain. They are nobly dissatisfied, and at the heart of their dissatisfaction there is a driving ambition for a higher and fuller life. We owe everything to those hungry souls. They cannot be at rest, and in their restlessness is the promise of our richer peace.

It is evident that this noble hunger is associated with a larger vision. Nay, the hunger is the offspring of the vision. They have seen the New Jerusalem, "adorned as a bride prepared for her husband," and they are profoundly dissatisfied with the Jerusalem that is, and they labor to remove her meanness and her sordidness, and to clothe her in the strength and beauty of heaven's glory. Yes, it is the great vision which stirs the great yearning. It is when they have seen the Lord that the sluggish dwellers in Lotusland become keen and daring knights, who go forth to build and establish the kingdom of God. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." J. H. J.

When the Heart Overflows in Prayer

MONDAY, November 13. I Kings 8 : 54-62. "When Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer." Some one has truly said of this prayer, that it sums up all prayer, and that there is not one little petition or supplication anywhere that cannot nest in this grand adoration and entreaty. It seems to have resulted from the movement of the Holy Spirit over every chord of this many-chorded nature. "It stands alone; the stars pale before this diamond!" It has been remarked also that this prayer came from the lips of a layman. There were plenty of priests standing around, but they were all silent. We cannot have official, mechanized, and standardized prayers when the heart overflows. As we face the great crises of personal or national history, we demand the heart-opening and heart-cries of a man. Like all true prayer, it is filled with confession. We never reach the presence-chamber of the All-Holy without confessing that we are sinners, "for there is no man that sinneth not." Penitence, broken-heartedness, contrition, are our befitting garb.

When we are alone with God, we naturally begin by making a clean breast of whatever has intercepted the light of his countenance. But sin cannot unchild us. We do not cease to be sons because we have gone into the far country. "They be thy people and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest forth out of Egypt." That is the fundamental fact. We still bear God's image, though defaced. He cannot forsake the work of his own hands. F. B. M.

Christianity and the Prisoner

TUESDAY, November 14. Isa. 61 : 1. "To proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." There is a more or less general sentiment sweeping the country at present embodying a larger justice and a more humane point of view toward the prisoner. It is as though we had heard afresh the word of the psalmist: "Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee!"

Perhaps we have not stopped to consider how truly Christian is this attitude, or how it falls in line with the mission of Jesus to this earth, as that mission is outlined in the great words of this day's meditation.

Recently the writer spent an afternoon in a great factory where there are 500 ex-convicts working side by side with other employees; but it has been so planned that no one knows who these ex-convicts are; no one points them out and keeps them conscious of their shame. As a result they are becoming trustworthy, efficient, and the makers of good homes.

One man was pointed out as a successful and able workman, who had been in prison for years before he came to his present employment. The police, he said, had followed him and watched him so that it was impossible to get or to keep a job. "My wife is the only person who has ever been decent to me," he explained. The department manager told the man to come around to the factory and he would give him work. After a few weeks he wrote the man a letter, saying he had noticed his good work and sent him a little book. The next day the man appeared at the manager's office, and he could hardly speak. "You know," he said, "you are the only gentleman who ever spoke to me that way. No one ever sent me a book before. When I took it home last night, Mary and I couldn't eat any supper. I'm going to stick and make good." And he did. Was this not preaching good tidings? C. S. C.

Turning Passion into Prayer

WEDNESDAY, November 15. I Kings 17 : 1-7. "Elijah was subject to all the passions that men have, but he prayed." James 5 : 17. Sad is the life which lacks the pure flame of a holy passion. Our Lord, rebuking the church's indifference, says: "I would thou wert hot." But, above all, we must turn passion into prayer. Many men have passion for any and everything except prayer. In business, in their love of art, in their pursuit of pleasure, they are intense, in earnest, aglow; but in prayer formal, cold, and stilted.

We are familiar with the law of transmutation of force. The bullet which has just left the rifle strikes an impenetrable target and falls flattened to the ground, because its velocity was suddenly transmuted to heat, which softened it out of shape. But our passionate or emotional life may be changed to prayer that shakes the gate of heaven and prevails. We need more strong cryings and tears when we pray, not because we shall be heard on that account, but because we are filled with love to others and desires on their behalf, that cannot allow them to be unblessed.

This fervent spirit becomes kindled at the Cross or on the Ascension mount. But it may be greatly augmented by meditation. Whilst we muse the fire burns; then we speak with our tongue. Cast your patriotism, your humanity, your longing for your nearest and dearest, into the prayer-hour, and they will be as oil to the flames; and the hot metal of feeling will pour into the prayer-mold. F. B. M.

The Hidden Faults in Our Own Hearts

THURSDAY, November 16. Ps. 19 : 12. "Cleanse thou me from hidden faults." The proverb we so often hear, that a man is his own worst enemy, seems to have its reflection in many Bible passages. Paul feared the inner foes of his own bosom more than his political or sectarian enemies, and David and the writers of the Old Testament seem to be on the threshold often of revealing depths of sin hidden away in the secret chambers of the heart. The passage spoken by Jesus, "A man's foes shall be they of his own household," is interpreted by some to mean the foes of his own heart, the intimate sins hidden there.

There seems to be a weak link in the armor of most of us, and the great concern should be to realize this and to make that link as strong as the rest, lest it divide the chain of our life and career. Men do not go down on the rocks that are plain before every one, so surely as upon the hidden obstructions, known by the individual alone. These hidden faults differ with individuals, and the fiercest besetting sin is often along the line of the man's chief strength. Dr. Robertson said: "Moses was the meekest of men, but it was Moses who spoke inadvisedly with his lips. John was the apostle of love, yet he is the very type of religious intolerance in his attempt to call down fire from heaven. Peter was strong, intrepid in the hour of danger; yet it was Peter who proved a craven of cravens at the last."

We must be honest with ourselves, face our infirmity and, like Paul, bring it to Christ. He alone can strengthen our flagging wills and make us conquerors and more than conquerors through him. Strict honesty in confession to God of our hidden weaknesses gives us the assurance of the sure promise: "There hath no temptation taken you but such as man can bear: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make also the way of escape, that ye may be able to endure it." C. S. C.

The Miracle of Fervent Prayer

FRIDAY, November 17. I Kings 17 : 17-24. "And he cried unto the Lord." (1) Here were lonely wrestlings. He took the child from his mother's bosom, and carried the cold body up into the loft where he abode. Specific and intense desire, like Elijah's, resents companionship in the dread hour, and hastens to stand alone in the presence-chamber of the Most High. You may be sure that Jesus is going to do one of his chief miracles, when he sends the multitude away. (2) Humility. "He measured himself upon the child." Wonderful that so great a man should spend so much time and care on that slender frame. If you would save those who are dead in trespasses and sins, you must measure yourself upon them. You cannot win a little child for God unless you become as a little child yourself. (3) Perseverance. He measured himself three times. Undaunted and undismayed, he returned repeatedly to the quest. Deferred answers should urge us to a degree of holy boldness and pertinacity which we could not otherwise have reached. Only under such conditions could Jacob have said that he would not let the angel go, or the Syrophenician woman demand the one crumb from Christ's table, falling to the floor, which was sufficient to restore her child. "Men ought always to pray and not to faint." As the prophet presented the child to the awestruck and rejoicing mother, he elicited a confession which proved that, Gentile though she was, she had a true perception of the reality and worth of his religion—"Thou art a man of God." F. B. M.

Strength Brought Out of Weakness

SATURDAY, November 18. II Cor. 12 : 9. "For my strength is made perfect in weakness." Necessity is called the mother of invention; therefore, if the young man of wealth feels no necessity, he will fail of the greatest achievements. Many have struggled up out of the weakness of poverty to the summit of wealth and influence. Dante, Ruskin and Carlyle fought against the weakness of bodily ills till they attained the climax of intellectual greatness. The handicap of blindness enabled Milton of England, Milburn of America and Matheson of Scotland to behold visions of thought and beauty far beyond their fellows. Prisons have palaces proved to minds like Paul and Bunyan, where they were inspired to produce pen-pictures that have delighted and blessed every land.

The little child becomes strong because it stretches out its hand to the parent. So the sinful and troubled soul that stretches out its hand of faith to the heavenly Father feels underneath it the everlasting arms, as it rests on the bosom of forgiveness and love. The law of love in Christ is not the survival of the fittest, or that the weakest go to the wall, for here grace creates fitness and meekness for the highest inheritances.

If God in nature can produce the diamond from the black carbon, the white lily from the dark earth and bulb, the great tree from the tiny seed, he can bring purity out of sinfulness, strength out of weakness, heaven out of hell. E. W. C.

Mill Hand Becomes Millionaire

IT is not an unusual thing for hands in a mill to work their way up by ability, industry and integrity to a partnership, the proprietorship and wealth. It is seldom that a mill hand becomes a millionaire in a day without any effort on his part. Thomas Conlin had worked hard all his life without getting ahead, and was engaged in the plant of a steel company at New Kensington, Pa., at twenty-five cents an hour. He was called to the office and was notified that he had fallen heir to $1,500,000. The old man of 79 almost fainted at the news and said, "I don't know what I will do with it." Thirty years ago he and his brother, Frank, came to this country from Ireland and worked five years together. His brother then said he was going to Australia to try and make his fortune, and he did. The other day he died and left that fortune by will to his brother Thomas. If the old man does not know what to do with his fortune, about a million or more of his countrymen would be glad to volunteer him advice upon the subject. It is to be hoped that the sharpers who will flock about him like packs of wolves will not get any of it. We trust that God's Spirit may open his eyes to the opportunities and privileges of aiding the poor and suffering on a large scale and in permanent form, and in promoting the kingdom of Christ. We are heirs to a fabulous spiritual fortune in this life and in that which is to come by our kinship to our Elder Brother, by the side of which millions of gold dollars are as trash. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you." (I Peter 1 : 3, 4.)

Tomatoes on Potato Vine

ELEVEN fully matured tomatoes and as many good-sized potatoes growing on the same plant in the vegetable garden of the Pennsylvania State College mark the advent of the newest freak plants in the vegetable world. If further experimentation proves its commercial value, the latest creation in plant life is expected to revolutionize vegetable growing by combining economy of space with productiveness of the plant. C. E. Meyers, professor of vegetable growth in the Pennsylvania State College, planted a potato. Upon the strong stalk that grew up he grafted a young tomato sprout, using the grafting wax and binding as in fruit trees. About a dozen ordinary sized tomatoes grew to ripeness, and about the same number of healthy potatoes grew in the ground. Strange to say, the potatoes fed the tomato vines, and the tomato vines helped make the potatoes. If the experiment shall prove practical and profitable what a revolution there will be in vegetable gardening! The science of grafting fruit trees was known in olden times and is thus referred to, to illustrate a great religious truth: "Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in." (Rom. 11 : 19.)

Post Office Offenders Favored

MEN of the Post Office Department of the United States who have "gone wrong" are to get an opportunity to regain their positions. One man, for years the assistant postmaster of Milwaukee, has just completed a term in the Leavenworth prison for rifling letters. He will be allowed to try for a clerkship in the same office. He must pass a civil service examination. The post-office authorities at Washington have approved his application, despite the custom that has had almost the force of law, and the chances are that he will soon be in the harness again. E. E. Dudding, president of the Prisoners' Relief Society, has busied himself with the authorities in securing the clemency, the new start for this class of offenders. His plea was, "The man has atoned for his fault to the public through his service in the prison. Now he is out, give him a chance to make a man of himself." It is kind and in the main safe for Uncle Sam to give these wayward men another chance, a new start in life. Society is freezing cold, wickedly so, toward the convict. A certain amount of wisdom of caution is proper in dealing with the discharged convict, a right to demand an evidence of penitence and determination to reform, but the hand of help ought to be extended to every malefactor who desires to do better. This is manly, it is Christly. The action of the Post Office Department toward these men wanting to turn over a new leaf is in harmony with the apostolic injunction: "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." (Gal. 6 : 1.)

New Rock-Tunneling Machine

A NEW rock-tunneling machine that can bore through the hardest rock swiftly, economically and safely, invented by Oliver O. App, of New York, is now doing demonstration work along the line of the new subway, near the Grand Central Station. This machine has been able to cut an eight-foot hole in the hard New York gneiss at the rate of about nine feet in twenty-four hours. The machine is designed to chip away the rock by the action of a number of pneumatic hammers fitted with chisels which turn on a longitudinal axis. The carriage of the machine consists of a two-wheel main truck at the rear and a two-wheel guide truck at the front, all resting on a standard gauge track. The front and rear halves are separate; the front carrying a revolving head which moves forward by means of two lead screws at the rate of one inch per revolution. The main truck moves forward by gearing when the front has advanced two to three feet. The cutting head consists of a hub and four arms placed 90 degrees apart. The arms carry fourteen hammers, which are so arranged that the chisels cut concentric circles into the breast of the rock. The secret of the machine's success is in the arms and chisel and hammer arrangement. When a chisel is not resting against the rock there is no action of the hammer, but as soon as the tool contacts with the rock the hammer operates. Hence it happens that where there is no resistance—as in mud or clay lodes and fissures—the tool merely cuts in revolving on the arm, but the harder the rock the harder the hammer blow upon the chisel.

Man's mastery over nature, over the obstacles which hinder his progress and plans, is a type of his mastery in the moral and spiritual realm, and triumph over hindrances. The great tunneling tool to cut the hardest rock and bore through the tallest mountain of spiritual hindrance is faith. Christ thus recognizes it: "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible to you." (Matt. 17 : 20.)

Torn by Russian Bear

A MAGAZINE writer of Brooklyn had his right hand badly torn by a Russian bear in the Zoo at Prospect Park, Brooklyn, recently. Contrary to the rules against feeding the animals, the man, crawling under the rail in front of the bear cage, offered a fine polar bear some candy. It did not care for the candy but wanted him. Catching him by the hand it dragged him close up against the bars and was badly lacerating him. His cries attracted the attention of the keeper, who prodded the beast with iron bars and released the man, who was taken to the Methodist Hospital for treatment. There are many bears among men. The man tried to do the bear a kindness in feeding him candy, but Bruin not only did not appreciate the favor but met it with the most savage ingratitude. The ungrateful man or woman is the meanest of the mean. Some are so basely ungrateful that they seem to take pleasure in selecting those who have done them the most favors and betraying and punishing them in some form or other. The bears in the cage do not know any better than to be savage and mean. The human bears outside of the cages know better. The rescue of this man by the keepers calls to mind the rescue om bear in olden times: "The Lord t d livered me out of the paw of the li an out of the paw of the bear, he will liv me out of the hand of this Phil ine" (I Sam. 17 : 37.)

The Fur Farms of Alaska

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyrighted, 1916, by Frank G. Carpenter

DURING the past few weeks I have visited some of the largest fox farms of Alaska. There are altogether, perhaps, ten or ve in the territory. There is one opper Center on the trail between banks and Valdez, which is said ave 200 foxes, and to have sold live ones not long ago for just t $10,000. There is a farm at er Hot Springs which has paid as as $1,500 apiece to the Indians lack fox pups, and one near here h has interested Eastern capital he amount of $300,000. Judge an, a member of the Alaska legis- e, has established a fox farm at gnak on the Kobuk River in ic Alaska. He is raising white s as well as blacks, reds and ses, and says that these animals be reared just as easily as cattl hogs.

he business of fur farming was be- by the Canadians about twenty- years ago. The first fox ranches on Prince Edward Island, and little island today has the largest most profitable farms in the ld. There are 210 different com- es engaged in the business, and r capitalization is about $30,- 000. The island has about 600 ranches, and the business has ad to other parts of Canada. r 400 companies are engaged in it ova Scotia, Newfoundland and Brunswick, and farms have started also in Quebec, Ontario Western Canada. There are ral fox farms in New England, e in New York state and a ber in the far northwestern part he continent.

he chief originator of fox farming Charles Dalton, who is now a ionaire member of parliament. was born in Canada and started as a fur trader and trapper. He ized the value of fox skins and cluded to see if he could not raise es in captivity. He started with foxes, but about twenty years ago able to get two pairs of silvers, ch he bred on his farm on one of islands. He succeeded and kept buying wild animals and breeding e ones. He was known to have ny fine skins, but no one knew of wealth he was making until the ll banks of. the neighborhood used to take any more of his cash deposit. It then leaked out that was selling skins produced on his ch for prices which averaged hun- ds of dollars per skin, and that he s fast growing rich. I have before a record of 203 skins sold by him m his farm on Prince Edward Island. e sales cover a period of fifteen years. that time he sold 203 fox skins, which ught him in just about $158,000, or the average $778.28 per skin. Dalton sold foxes for breeding. When he d his ranch it had twenty pair of silver es upon it. He got $500,000 for it, an average of $25,000 per pair.

n the meantime the news of Dalton's cess had spread over the world. her fox farms were established and re capitalized at large sums, according the number of breeding animals y had. Many of them have paid ge dividends, and it has been shown t, rightly handled, there is no other e-stock industry that can produce ything like the profits of the raising foxes.

But suppose we visit a big fox farm uated in the Tanana Valley, a mile d a half from Fairbanks. It consists ten acres of cleared land, the greater rt of which is covered with pens in ich these little animals live. Looking it from a distance, the fox farm has the pearance of a great chicken yard with lls of woven wire and hen coops of rious sizes inside them. Each of the ns is fifty feet long, eight feet wide d about ten feet high.

The wire is much like chicken wire, but is made of tough steel, and it extends as high above the ground as the wire about a tennis court. The wire is sunk about four feet in the ground and is then bent over so that it runs under the ground for about two feet. This is to prevent the foxes from burrowing out from under the wire. At the top the wire has an overhang of two feet, forming a little roof of that width all around the coop. This is to prevent the foxes climbing over. Each pen has its own kennel, like a dog kennel. It is entered by a board chute up which the fox runs when it goes in, and in some cases wooden pipes a foot square serve as an entrance. The foxes run in and out of these pipes, and they usually carry their food inside to eat it.

Introducing Miss Carpenter, the author's daughter, who travels with him, and the two fox puppies mentioned in the story

There is but one pair of foxes in each pen. The animals are very timid, and they have to be handled carefully. Most of the fox farmers will not permit visitors to enter their property for fear they will frighten the foxes. The animals grow crazy when excited and they sometimes eat their young. On the other hand, they get acquainted with their keepers, and there are some which become so tame that strangers can handle them. During my visit to a fox farm on the Tanana River, my daughter, who is with me, picked up two little silver gray fellows of the size of kittens and hugged them to her while I made a snapshot. I do not know what those foxes are worth at this writing, but three years ago they would have brought a thousand dollars apiece.

The big ten-acre fox farm at Fairbanks was started a year or so ago with a capitalization of about $300,000. So far, about $60,000 has been invested, and this includes the cost of the farm and the equipment and the breeding animals. The land, kennels and all the machinery cost $18,000, and the breeding animals $37,000. There are, altogether, about 200 animals, including foxes and others, and all that is needed to care for them is two men.

I have asked a number of the managers as to the food used for their fur-bearing animals. On the fox farm here it costs $11 a year to feed a fox, $5 to feed a mink and $4.80 to feed a marten or sable. The animals are given salmon, moose meat, horse meat and rabbits, and also carrots and turnips. On the fox farm near Dawson a common feed is rice and rabbits cooked together into a stew. One farm there feeds sixteen rabbits and fifteen pounds of rice a day to forty-two foxes. The stew is fed cold morning and evening. The foxes will come out of their dens and grab it and carry it inside with them. After a while they come back and get more. The farmers of Prince Edward Island have found that foxes must have plant food or vegetables. In their wild state they eat not only flesh, but grass and berries, and if the latter is withheld they become wormy. Other good foods outside of flesh are biscuits, yeast bread, porridge, apples, milk and eggs. The animals will eat dog biscuit, but they prefer plain hardtack. Bread is liked better if grease drippings are poured upon it. Some farmers use tallow as butter. Ground bone is sometimes given, and a little limewater is fed to growing foxes with their milk. Young foxes are fed all they will eat. When they get older it is not well for their fur to make them too fat.

On the farm at Fairbanks I saw one litter of foxes that was being mothered by a cat. She had three baby foxes which, when grown, will be worth from $500 to $1,000 apiece, and possibly more. The mother of these foxes was a very nervous animal and the farmers feared she might kill her young. So they were taken away and given to the cat in place of her kittens. The cat adopted them and she plays with them as though they were her real baby kittens. The thousand-dollar foxes seem to like their new mother quite as well as their old one.

The managers tell me it is necessary to have cats around a fox farm for such complications. They say that one man in eastern Canada lost a litter of silver foxes because he would not pay a high price for a cat. The mother of the foxes had died, and in looking around to find a cat in the proper condition, the farmer discovered but one only. The owner of the cat appreciated his need and refused to sell his cat for less than $500. The fox farmer was indignant and refused. The result was that he lost five little foxes that might have been worth $25,000, and all for a five-hundred-dollar cat. One fox raised by a cat here at Fairbanks had a pelt which was valued at $800.

The breeding of the foxes is very carefully handled. They have only one litter a year, and a litter may consist of from one to nine pups. A fox will continue to bear up to ten or eleven years of age. The young look like dog pups and play and bark just like dogs.

There has been a great change in the prices of foxes and fox skins since the breaking out of the great war in Europe. Immediately following that time the great firm of Lampsons in London, which handled practically all of the furs of the world, closed its doors and declared it would hold no sales during the war. This knocked the life out of the fur trade and prices fell. This was so during 1914 and 1915; ordinary fox skins dropped to one-third their value and the fine ones were put away. Beavers brought less than half price and marten and lynx skins were a drug in the market. In the latter part of 1915 furs began to go up, and they are now fast coming back to their old figures. They will continue to advance and silver fox skins will probably be worth more than ever before.

The Lord sends the sunshine and the rain but the farmer must do his own plowing.

Delicious Cup Cakes

One of Marion Harris Neil's New Crisco Recipes

½ cupful Crisco
1 cupful sugar
2 eggs
2 teaspoonluls baking powder
½ teaspoonful salt
2 cupfuls flour
½ teaspoonful almond extract

(Use accurate level measurements)

Cream the Crisco with the sugar, add the well beaten yolks, then alternately the flour sifted with the baking powder and salt, lastly add the stiffly beaten whites and the extract. Bake in well Criscoed cups in hot oven 15 to 20 minutes. When cold cut out centers and fill with whipped cream. If desired decorate with a cherry.

Some housewives have the knack of making unusually good things to eat. Women who are wide awake to improved methods of cooking find that Crisco is a shortening which helps them in the preparation of tasty, dainty foods. And they enthusiastically tell their friends so.

CRISCO
For Frying-For Shortening
For Cake Making

To appreciate the delicacy of Crisco try it in the above recipe for cup cakes. They make a tempting dessert, something out of the ordinary.

Crisco is a wholesome product, so pure, sweet, odorless and tasteless that it is an aid to better cooking.

One reason good cooks like Crisco is that they know it is purely vegetable, the rich cream of edible oil, and so consistently uniform they can depend upon it every day in the year.

Two Valuable Books

Every woman who strives for tastiness in foods should send for "The Whys of Cooking" in which Janet McKenzie Hill of the Boston Cooking School and editor of "American Cookery" deals with cooking and other household problems. Some of your own perplexing worries may be solved in the many questions asked and answered. Another new volume of the Crisco Library is "Balanced Daily Diet" by the same author. It enables the housewife to choose foods that will best build for mental and physical strength. Both books are well-bound, illustrated in color, contain many new recipes and the interesting Story of Crisco. Worth much more than the five 2-cent stamps which will bring either one of these books to you. Send 20 cents for both. Address Dept. S-11, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Acts 28 : 11-31

Closing Scenes of a Great Ministry

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE are now completing our year's study of one of the greatest of Bible books—"The Acts of the Apostles." No boy or girl, man or woman, who has gone carefully into the weekly lessons which have touched every chapter, can have failed to receive a great inspiration for life and service. It is indeed a book of acts, not mere words, mere theories, or even of great doctrines, but primarily acts—and facts. There is little room for controversy or difference of opinion here. The mighty tides of the Spirit had swept these men on to deeds of love and ministry and teaching, until the words of the commission given in the first chapter were fulfilled: "Ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." Remember that the superb story of Paul is typical, and representative of the lesser work of the many noble servants of Christ whose names are spread through the New Testament, and, better still, "are written in the Lamb's Book of Life."

A Pleasant Journey Through Historic Points

JUST as soon as the signs of spring began to appear, Julius the centurion embarked his prisoners on another Alexandrian grain-ship which had wintered at Malta. In bounteous recompense for the preaching and healing of Paul and Luke, the natives supplied the shipwrecked, penniless men with everything they needed and gave them a royal send-off. The new vessel must have been a large one to be able to take on nearly three hundred additional passengers; and, a good omen to the crew, her figurehead was "The Twin Brothers," Castor and Pollux, who were supposed to be the guardians of seafaring men. Bright boys and girls will be interested in reporting to the class the reasons why the ports of call were notably interesting to the traveling missionary-in-chains. Syracuse was the great Greek settlement which had become the capital of Sicily. Rhegium is memorable to us because of the earthquake less than eight years ago, when Messina and Reggio were devastated. Between Rhegium and Puteoli, the dangerous strait of Messina must first be negotiated. Look at your map and see how narrow it is at the end, with dangerous rocks and whirlpools. "Between Scylla and Charybdis" is a proverb still. Do you know what it means?

Friendship and Courage

WHEN at length Puteoli was reached, Luke does not so much as mention Mount Vesuvius, the great volcano there, but records with joy that there they "found brethren." Friends are the solace of life. To find brethren, men likeminded, surpasses the view of mighty mountains. Paul was a master in the art of making friends. We fail to appreciate him if we think him a cold logician or a dogmatic theologian and no more. All Christian believers were dear to him, and astonishingly soon he was dear to them. The rest of his journey up the Appian Way to Rome, after a week with these brethren at Puteoli, was like a triumphal procession. Some of the Roman Christians walked forty-six miles to welcome the great apostle. From this point, the Market of Appius, forward, companies of disciples met them. Paul's heart rose in joyous thanksgiving to God. It had been a long, hard trip, and perhaps death waited at the end; but he took courage. What a time they must have had as they traveled on together, giving and receiving testimony of the grace of God and telling of the progress of the Gospel!

If Paul needed friends to renew his spirits and increase his courage, how true it is of the rest of us weaker followers of the same Lord! We should not pass like ships in the night with the merest signal of notice. Ready to sympathize, givers of cheer, true disciples should fellowship together on the way of life. We all have our hard roads and our stormy passages, and we need to have God's comfort made real by human brotherhood. Do you remember that beautiful incident in the classic of friendship, the story of David and Jonathan, where David was a hunted fugitive in the wilderness: "And Jonathan arose, and went to David in the wood, and strengthened his hand in God." God's strength in a friend's hand-clasp! So Paul was strengthened now. Shaking hands can be made a sacrament, a means of grace.

Not long ago I witnessed two men, strangers, as each discovered that the other was a Mason. What comradeship, what interchange of experiences, followed! I thought with regret that men are not always overjoyed to find their fellows to be Christians, brothers in the Church of God, nor filled with enthusiasm at the thought. Yet I have known men, with the spirit of Paul, who have traveled far, and every Sabbath day have entered the churches, the Bible classes, the Christian meetings, and found, in a strange town, brothers beloved. "A man that would have friends must show himself friendly." How unwise for a Christian to languish, bored and lonesome, in a hotel when he can hold high fellowship in a church!

To the Jew First

UPON arrival at the Eternal City, Paul as an uncondemned Roman citizen was allowed to select his own lodgings and was given a measure of liberty. In his case the restriction was galling enough—always shackled by one hand to a soldier. As soon as Paul had settled his affairs he sent for the leading Jews of Rome and set forth his case. He always felt a peculiar responsibility to his own people. Besides, he did not wish them to get a prejudiced view of the affair from Judea, and possibly find them organizing active opposition here as well. He soon learned that they were ignorant of the particulars of his trial, but were already prejudiced against Christianity ("this sect . . . everywhere spoken against"). Paul made arrangements with them, and on a set date, presumably a Sabbath, he spent the whole day in the closest grapple with their prejudices.

Then, as now, "some believed and some believed not." The simple, frank statement of Paul's limited success that day ought to be an inspired consolation to us when we seem to fail in our ministry of the word of life. Not even an apostle could convert everybody. But we must be sure that we have made the full effort. Paul closed the incident by showing that Isaiah had had the same experience, and that it was prophecy that the old Israel should be superseded by the new and greater. With high confidence, Paul himself prophesied of the Gentiles, "They will hear."

The Fruits of the Two Years

THE Gentiles indeed did hear and heed in Paul's own time. In fact, the center of gravity in Christendom shifted from Jew to Greek in the first fifty years. And all historians attribute to Paul the dominant influence in this.

At Rome, this master of friendship gave individual attention to every soldier who took his watch of four hours with the prisoner. Of course, there is no definite estimate of the results, but from what we know of Paul's success and of the need of definite religious convictions at Rome, we imagine he enlisted many a "good soldier of Jesus Christ." And these Christian legionaries went everywhere throughout the great empire! In writing to his beloved Philippian Christians he joyfully sends them greetings from the "saints in Cæsar's household." Christians in the palace of Nero! Saints in the Prætorian

Think of the energy and executive ability that organized all this activity.

How the Story Ends

LUKE wisely closes his tale at a high point: Paul in Rome at last, successful, unhindered, his very chain a tool for service! Why did he stop there? It is altogether possible that he wrote the whole book about that time, for we know from the letters that Luke was there. It is possible that Paul had just been briefly released when the book was sent to Theophilus, for whom it was primarily written—and that his subsequent imprisonment and martyrdom followed soon after. Or it may be that Paul's death was so well known an event that Luke, writing afterwards, simply narrated the events leading up to it.

Such a life is the greatest testimony possible of the power of Christ, "who strengtheneth me." It goes forth to meet the unseen with a shout of triumph: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith." To enter fully, appreciatively into such a career is to be yourself a bigger, better Christian, and also to estimate more highly your own opportunities. Paul belongs to you, and Paul's Lord. "All things are yours, whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas or the world, or life or death, or things present or things to come, all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's." Enter upon your heritage, fellow Christian, for Jesus came that we might have life, and that we might have it abundantly. Like the great apostle to the Gentiles, give the world yourself, for your life is needed too!

Sunday School Methods

RANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Ho to Have a Good Teachers' Meeting

I many communities, there is a aturday afternoon or week night eeting of all the Sunday school ers to assist the teachers in planthe lesson. Where the Uniform n is used in such a gathering, the half-hour is often employed in the ntation of a general course on the itself, or some lessons on teaching ods. The meeting then divides Elementary, Secondary and Adult s, to consider plans for teaching sson to these particular ages.

hen the graded lessons are used, lesson groups are arranged for nners, Primary, Junior, Intermedind Senior teachers, and sometimes fficers' group to consider problems hool management.

r the average school and commu- however, the best plan is to have a ers' meeting for the school, led by pastor, the superintendent, or a teacher. With between eighty and y per cent. of the schools still using niform lesson, this must be the most ive plan for the present.

e time for the teachers' meeting is rtant. Where a week night cannot ken for this purpose in addition to rayer meeting, the pastor can make unday school lesson the topic for prayer meeting. Sometimes the ers meet for supper at the church ayer meeting night, and the lesson ken up before the prayer meeting.

e plan for the meeting is of first rtance. We shall not attempt to ss here the features other than the n study to brighten up the meeting, as taking fifteen minutes for the ssion of a particular school or er problems, the reading and ssion of a chapter in some book for eacher, such as "The Teachers' lestick" (Miss Slattery), or "The her that Teaches" (Marquis), or chers and Teaching" (Trumbull). e we need special help is in the n preparation.

e of the very best plans is the gle" used in the Marion Lawrance ol at Toledo for many years, and large number of schools throughout ountry. This consists of a plan ve some teachers ready on particu- ngles of the lesson. The arrangement of these angles gives a complete view of the lesson. These angles are:

1. Lesson Approach. This will include the subject of the last lesson, and a brief statement of intervening events leading up to the lesson.
2. Lesson Story. This should be told by some teacher, in his or her own words, as graphically as possible.
3. Analysis. This will be a working outline of the lesson for purposes of studying and teaching.
4. References. This will consist of helpful references and parallel passages and their bearing on the lesson.
5. Biography. The persons, classes and nations should be described.
6. Orientalisms. Customs peculiar to the Orient should be explained. Material for this is available in the Christian Herald, the Bible Dictionary and Sunday School Helps.
7. Principal Teachings. These should include the lesson aim, and be arranged with reference to the ages to which they will best apply.
8. First Step. Show a good way to secure attention, to introduce the lesson—some good point of contact. If the front doorsteps are not in place, we cannot expect to get into the house.
9. Department Teaching. A model plan can be presented for the Primary, Junior, Intermediate and Senior or Adult department lesson.
10. Objects Give list of objects that can be used to attract attention.
11. Illustrations. These can be presented from the Bible, nature, newspaper, experience or Lesson Helps.
12. Practical Points. These should bring the lesson down to every-day life.

If there are only a few teachers, one teacher can take several "Angles" or the leader, if it is best, can present them all.

One pastor has a large number of these angle points printed for use during the season, and fills in the name of the teacher to whom the particular "angle" is assigned, and hands these out several weeks in advance of the lesson.

To make such a meeting effective, there should be on hand maps of Palestine, of Paul's journeys, and of the Bible World, including, if possible, a relief map of Palestine.

The three P's and three D's have been used in these meetings as a plan of study, namely: parallel passages, persons, places, dates, doings, doctrines. Dr. Schauffler has used with good results in his class of teachers the five W's: who, when, where, what and what then?

Judge Tires Best By the Intention and Ability of the Maker

Sight and touch are not final when you are judging tires. You cannot buy them as you do clothes.

A casing that will give way in a day's journey may look better than one that will run 10,000 miles.

A tire is good only as the manufacturer means to make it good and has the resources to do it.

So the intention of the maker, and his ability to do what he means to do, form the best basis for judging tires.

And the intention and ability of the maker are proved best by the combined judgment of tire users—for public favor finally is bestowed in exact proportion to value received.

So when you know that one out of every three new cars comes from the factory on Goodyear Tires—and that no other brand has so great a demand as this—you have the most important fact that can help you in selecting tires for your car.

* * *

Goodyear intention to make the best tires has been expressed in a continuous revolution of tire design and manufacturing methods. The Goodyear tire-making machines, the Goodyear fabric mill, the All-Weather Tread, the No-Hook Bead with its braided piano wire base, the On-Air Cure and other features—all are part of this continuous revolution. Each feature has corrected a recognized tire weakness and some of the most important features are exclusively Goodyear, kept so by patents or by high manufacturing costs which other makers refuse to pay.

Goodyear Tires, Heavy Tourist Tubes and "Tire Saver" Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

Correspondence Bible Study Has Been Demonstrated as a Most Efficient Educational Method

Clergymen, Missionaries, Evangelists, Sunday School Teachers, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. Workers, and others, are daily testifying to the blessings of correspondence study. The editor of one of the greatest Sunday School weeklies in the world has said:

JAMES M. GRAY, D. D.
Dean of
The Moody Bible Institute

"And so this Bible Correspondence Course is strengthening the impression that Bible study is at once the most fascinating and most important of all studies. Since it is, I must increasingly give it the first place in my life, and adjust other reading and study to suit."

You will become just as enthusiastic as soon as you start your first course. We cannot urge too strongly all who wish a more thorough knowledge of God's Word to take up the work with us this season.

The Moody Bible Institute has a fully equipped department exclusively devoted to teaching by correspondence.

Our aim is for careful business administration, most efficient teaching, and courteous attention to all inquirers and students.

Our courses are thoroughly tested and increasingly popular. Notwithstanding the world war which has affected our work in many parts of the world, the absorption of the people in the prosperous business conditions in our country, and the opposition of destructive criticism, large gains were made last year over any previous year. Our courses will satisfy your needs.

We Offer These Eight Courses

Synthetic Bible Study
—a fascinating study of the contents of the whole Bible, "really in a class by itself."

Practical Christian Work —for soul winners and workers in exceptional forms of Christian service.

Bible Doctrine
—a biblical course in the great doctrines of the Christian faith.

Bible Chapter Summary
—a unique method of becoming acquainted with every chapter in the Bible.

Introductory Bible Course
—true to its name.

Evangelism
—nothing in modern evangelism overlooked.

Christian Evidences —an old subject brought up to date.

THE SCOFIELD BIBLE CORRESPONDENCE COURSE
—scholarly, comprehensive, tested for a quarter of a century, and taken already by ten thousand students, is still presented as the most comprehensive course in Bible study ever offered by correspondence.

A Traveling Man's Sabbath

By JAMES M. DAVIS

President of the Gideons, the Christian Commercial Travelers' Association of America

I HAD been traveling all week, with heavy work. Saturday evening found me at a beautiful Illinois town on Rock River.

Finding comfortable quarters for the Sabbath, my thoughts turned to services for the day. Looking back, it seems to me I never in all my life so desired to be in the house of God and to come in touch and communion with his dear children.

Noticing a church near by, I was told it was the First Methodist, and that it had just been dedicated. There, at the first services, I decided to go. At nine o'clock Sabbath morning the bell rang, and I was soon ready. I noticed that people were entering the church basement, and I followed the company. I found about 80 in attendance, and learned from an aged saintly looking Scotchman that it was to be a class-meeting. He gave a hearty welcome to all and announced the hymn:

A charge to keep I have,
  A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
  And fit it for the sky.

After prayer and another song, the pastor was the first to speak. He said: "I was born in England. My father being a shoemaker, I followed his trade. My father was a Christian, a very quiet, thoughtful man. Often, mornings, he would outline my work for the day, and then not a word would be spoken.

"To our little church there came a great awakening. Many were entering from darkness into light. I was deeply moved, and after days of prayer surrendered my heart to God at the age of sixteen. I felt at once the call to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ. With this conviction I worked quietly for two years, keeping my own counsel. Then the call came so strongly I could stand it no longer. Turning to father, I asked if he could let me go.

"I told him frankly I felt a c

The Correspondence of Prof. David Smith, D.

THE chairman of an appeal tribunal, a broad-minded man, recently wrote me: "Now will you please invent a kind of mental periscope that will enable me to see for certain whether the man is directing his conscience or whether his conscience is really and truly directing him?" I could only reply that I knew no perfect "periscope," but the best I knew was the independent judgment of those who have had intimate knowledge of the man's religious life and mental outlook. It occurred to me afterward that I might have suggested that a pertinent question might be whether the man had ever really suffered or made sacrifices for conscience' sake as well as claimed privileges.—H. G. C.

IT seems to me by no means sufficient to determine whether a man is directing his conscience or is directed by it. In the former case he is an impostor; but in the latter case, while absolutely sincere and ready to suffer for his conscience' sake, he may nevertheless be the dupe of a false monitor. It is not enough that a man should obey his conscience, unless his conscience be a trustworthy guide. "Conscience itself," says Oliver Wendell Holmes, "requires a conscience, or nothing can be more unscrupulous." Bernard of Clairvaux in his De Interiori Domo ("The Inner House") writes that the inner house is conscience, and he conceives it as supported upon seven pillars: "a Good Will," "Memory of God's Benefits," "a Clean Heart," "a Free Mind," "a Right Spirit," "a Devout Soul," and "an Enlightened Reason."

Conscience is a complex organism. Its germ is a Good Will, a resolute determination toward the right. This finds its inspiration and reinforcement in the Memory of God's Benefits, the realization from past experience that, when we side with the right, we are in line with God's purpose. But, in order that God's purpose may prevail, it is necessary that our wills should be linked with it; and this is achieved (1) by cleanness of heart, (2) by a free mind, disengagement of the thoughts from worldly entanglement, (3) by a right spirit, the direction of the soul toward God, and (4) by a devout soul, an ports, or perhaps better, rumors Spain assert that Portugal is egged on by Great Britain to k Spain, and go so far as to say that nish province has been promised to igal in such event.

e Teutonic advance in the udja continue to grow in im- nce, and it now seems as though whole Russo-Rumanian line, from Black Sea to the Danube River, been forced back a considerable nce over its whole length. It ars that in addition to the capture uzla, the port on the Black Sea, heights of Toprai Sari, practically nly elevation of any importance on portion of the Dobrudja, fell into Teutonic hands; while on their extreme left, near the Danube, their line was brought north to a very few miles from the important strategic town of Rashova.

The capture of Constanza, Rumania's chief seaport and the terminal of the railroad between the Black Sea and the Danube, by von Mackensen's forces on October 23, and the advance of his troops across the railroad line from that place to Cernavoda places Rumania in an embarrassing position, as to the means by which troops or supplies are to reach her from Russia. As long as Constanza and the railroad line leading from this port to Bucharest were in Rumanian hands, the Russians could supply Rumania's needs by sea from Odessa, but now it will be necessary to use the rather roundabout and poorly constructed single track line of railway running through Bendery, and Bolgrad in Bessarabia to Galatz in Rumania.

The next objective of von Mackensen's army, the capture of Rashova on his left wing, and of Cernavoda, head of the Danube bridge, a few miles north of Rashova, where the railroad crosses the Danube on its way to Bucharest, was attained later. These two positions were strenuously defended by the Russo-Rumanians, and their capture and the possession of the bridge by the Teutons opens an easy road to Bucharest. Reports from London, October 26, state that the Rumanians blew up the bridge at Cernavoda, and that the Germans have been stayed at the Transylvania border. Premier Asquith, in the House, deprecated "undue pessimism."

It begins to look as though in the course of the next few weeks, possibly by the end of the coming winter months, Rumania will be added to the list of countries which have ceased to exist, at least for the time being.

The situation on the Macedonian front continues the same, though violent fighting did occur between the Bulgarians and Serbians on the bend of the Cerna River. Elsewhere the fighting was of the skirmish order. Additional German troops are reported to have arrived on this front.

On the eastern front also the fighting was not of the first order. In Galicia the Russians were finally completely driven from the west bank of the Narayukva River, but north of Brody the Russians were successful in repulsing a Teuton attack.

The Macedonian front was, on the whole, quiet. Floods on the center and right wing of the Allies have put a summary stop to any operations thereon. On the left wing the Serbians claim to have captured several trenches in the Cerna region from the Bulgarians and Germans, but these latter deny this statement.

Count Karl Stuergkh, Premier of Austria, was assassinated in Vienna on October 21 by Ludwig Adler, a publisher. Count Stuergkh had been premier of Austria for five years, and was fifty-seven years of age, having been in government service since 1881. His assassin was reported to be eccentric and a radical Socialist, and is reported to have committed the deed because of the refusal of the premier to convene the Austrian parliament.

On the night of October 26 fast German torpedo-boat destroyers made a raid upon the British transport service across the English Channel. The British Admiralty admits the sinking of one destroyer, the beaching of another, and the loss of one empty transport, claiming the sinking of two German destroyers. The German Admiralty, however, claims the total or partial destruction of eleven outpost steamers, two or three torpedo-boat destroyers, and the sinking of the transport which the British Admiralty admits. Athens dispatches of October 27 reported that a final agreement had been reached between King Constantine and the Entente which binds Greece to sincere compliance with the demands of Admiral Fournet and assures no governmental opposition to the recruiting being conducted by the Venizelist movement which is now characterized as "anti-Bulgarian" instead of for "national defense." Greeks are also, according to the published terms of the agreement, to be guaranteed their constitutional liberties through the operation of the legal functions of Government.

Better Than Merchandise of Silver and Gold. It was reported in New York on October 27 that a cash offer of $2,500,000 for the property of the Brick Presbyterian Church at Fifth Avenue and Thirty-seventh Street had been refused unanimously by the trustees. The present building was erected in 1858, the church paying $58,000 for the plot in 1856. The feeling of the trustees is said to be that the Brick Church is a civic institution, and that the sentiment of the entire church body is to keep the old structure on its present site.

Bible Picture Contest

THE work imposed on the Committee of Judges has proven a greater task than anticipated, but we expect in about a week to receive their decisions as to the best verses for the 60 pictures. We are all naturally anxious to know the final selection of the Judges, but contestants must continue to be patient and realize that considerable time was required by the Judges to give a thorough examination to the exceedingly large number of answers submitted.

Some of our readers misunderstood our recent announcement in regard to the verses which were submitted to the Judges. We have since explained why there were almost 10,000 answers given from the 2,000 verses contained in "Gems from the Bible," this being due to the selection of the same identical verse as an answer for a number of different pictures. There seems to be an impression that verses other than those which were in "Gems from the Bible" were submitted to the Judges. Such an impression is incorrect. Every verse included in the 9,727 different answers submitted was taken from "Gems from the Bible." All verses submitted as answers which were not in "Gems from the Bible" were excluded.
